THE SALAD PLANT.

Furnishes its Own Dressing, and You May Pick and Eat It.
 Udo, a curious Japanese salad plant which might be said to be its own butler or steward, inasmuch as it produces, through some secret of oriental cultivation, a tender stalk which virtually is lettuce, celery and pineapple combined, is to be introduced into the United States by the department of agriculture.
 Although this valuable plant has been grown from ancient times in China, where it is called 'y tang kuel,' and was introduced into Japan many years ago, it is unknown to the western world. In fact, old American and European residents in Yokohama at this day have been kept in ignorance of the remarkable composite qualities of udo. Recently an alert American woman in Japan discovered the dish and, learning that Mr. Barbour Lathrop was in that country on an expedition in search of valuable seeds and plants for introduction into the United States, invited him to a dinner at which udo was served.
 There was set before the expert a dish of foam white shavings of a plant he had never seen before. First he thought it was some oriental form of celery, but as it had also a decided flavor of young lettuce, combined with a delicious suggestion of pineapple, he believed that he was enjoying a skillfully combined salad. When informed that it was the product of a single plant, he decided at once that it should be grown in the United States, and arrangements have been made for its American introduction.
 Udo salad is as crisp as the tenderest shoots of celery, but, unlike that vegetable, it has no stringy fibers. The fact that the edible young shoots of the udo plant are abundant throughout the winter months adds greatly to its value. The department of agriculture predicts that it will be as popular throughout the world as celery or a parsnip.
 There are two varieties of the plant. Kan udo is raised from seeds, while moyashi udo, which produces fresh sprouts all winter, is grown from cuttings. Both varieties produce a root stalk which sends out shoots year after year. For a decade after the initial planting the farmer has only to harvest the crop. After that period the field is replanted. The cultivation of this salad plant in America promises abundant profit. Even in Japan sixteen shoots frequently sell for 25 cents.
