

Nursing Record in Two Continents Hard to Equal

Nurse Waite of New Brighton writes: "While nursing in New York, in my early twenties, I was poisoned by food, my sister nurse recommended your wonderful Vegetable Laxative Pills. "I am never without them and have prescribed them for thousands of my patients who were suffering with indigestion, gas and sour stomach, biliousness, sick headache and indigestion caused by constipation poisoning."

Canadians may soon control the Enuantepec Railway shown in above map. It runs across Mexico from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific coast. It is but a six hour run. Sir Henry Thornton's visit to Mexico is taken to indicate the possibility of this purchase. It will save the freighting across Canada to Vancouver of stuff going to Mexico and South America. The railway runs from Puerto, Mexico, on the Gulf or Atlantic side to Salina Cruz on the Pacific coast.

AIR-COOLED STORAGE OF APPLES

(Experimental Farms-Note.)
The successful storage of apples is one of the main difficulties in the marketing of this fruit. There are fungus diseases and rots which appear to thrive under some storage conditions and other functional or physiological diseases which are prevalent under other storage methods. All varieties of apples do not respond similarly to identical storage treatment, but it is apparent that general conditions may be defined which will suit the average air-cooled storage warehouse.

A storage temperature between 30 deg. F. and 36 deg. F. and relative humidity from 75 percent to 90 percent offer about the best conditions for most varieties of apples. During the early storage season it is difficult to get inside temperature as low as desired, but if every advantage be taken of ventilator openings, doors, windows, etc., warehouse managers would find that the temperatures in storage can be lowered and held lower than is generally believed possible.

Ventilators should be opened when the outside temperature is lower than the temperature in the storage, to freezing temperatures. Likewise ventilators should be closed when the outside temperature is higher than that in the storage. After the fruit in storage has been lowered to as near 39 deg. F. as possible, the ventilators may be opened occasionally to lower the humidity and give a change of air in the store rooms.

Storage rooms should be thoroughly cleaned out before the season opens and given a good airing. Old containers which have been used for storing fruit in previous seasons should not be used as they usually contain an abundance of spores of rot producing organisms and cause much trouble later in the season. If it is found necessary to use such containers they should be well aired or dried out. In some sections it is possible to use the old barrels for storing or shipping potatoes or other vegetables.

SONIA
By VIDA HURST

When Sonia repeated her suggestion to Franklin he was not particularly pleased with it. "I must say, I don't think much of it," he replied. "Why not?" "I thought you'd be delighted. They wouldn't be in our way and we would be together two whole days, as you said."

INSTALLMENT XVII.

The trip to Franklin's shack in Lake county was planned for the next week-end. They were all to go in one car.

"I'll drive mother's large car," Franklin promised. "Then we can have plenty of room for our suitcases."

Maxine and Sonia spent their noon hours discussing what to take. Sonia insisted on sweaters and skirts, but Maxine wanted to take a silk dress.

"But why?" the younger girl asked impatiently. "I don't want to look like something the cat dragged in," complained Maxine. "In the evenings I want to look nice."

"Don't be silly," Sonia replied. "This is no afternoon tea. I'm wearing a sweater myself."

But she bought a new one, jade green, to match her eyes.

She had not seen so much of Franklin as usual that week. There had been a dinner-dance in his own set, and he explained to her that if he was to be away over Sunday he must spend an evening or two during the week with his mother.

Sonia agreed, serene in the thought of the approaching week-end. He had not explained which nights were to be spent at home, but she had naturally assumed all that he was not with her with the exception of the dinner. Having had more sleep than she was accustomed to, Sonia became restless by Thursday. She felt that she could not endure another evening alone in the apartment.

For the first time since she had dismissed him she wished for Henderson. It would be nice to have him always on hand to fill up a vacant evening, although she realized she could not expect that.

Then she thought of Don Stillwater. It had piqued her curiosity as well as her vanity that he had not bothered to look her up. She would have enjoyed talking with him. At last, in desperation, she telephoned Violet and suggested a movie.

As they waited in the line outside the theater Violet whispered, "Who's that with Franklin Crane?"

He was in front of them, with only four people between. A charming, vivacious girl of his own age was beside him. Sonia stared, sick at heart, at the rich fur coat, the blond bobbed hair curling softly under the plain little hat. Everything about her suggested breeding and luxury.

"Like Sidney, only much more so," thought Sonia.

Her eyes were blue and gray. She turned from time to time to watch the line forming behind them, keeping close hold of Franklin's arm.

It was her air of possession which whited Sonia's face. She had known about her, but to see him with her was much more serious. And at this moment she, Sonia Marsh, was nothing to him. Although the two were separated only a few feet, he was unconscious of her.

How could he be when his head was bent so attentively to listen to the other girl?

The line moved and they disappeared inside the theater.

Sick with jealousy, Sonia would gladly have left the line and gone home, but she dared not show any emotion before Violet. Throwing back her head, she chatted about anything else until at last they were seated in the darkened theater and she could safely relax her stiffened features.

The picture floated before her eyes in infinitesimal, meaningless pieces, although she heard herself laughing with Violet and agreeing with her whispered comments.

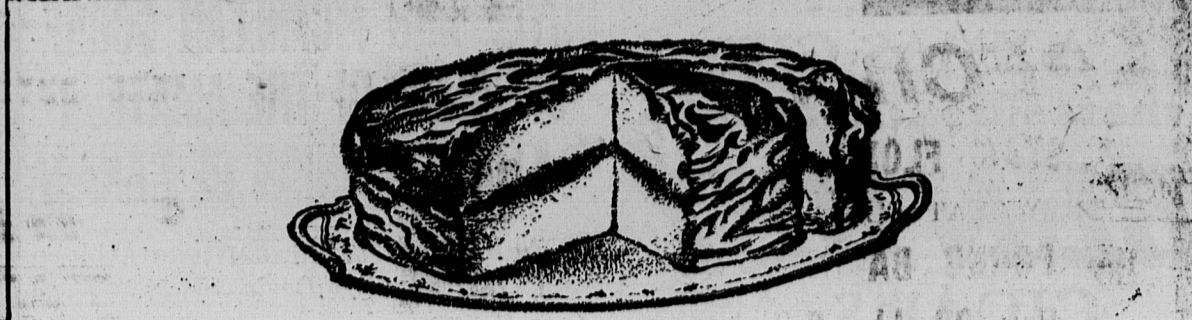

The situation was impossible. She could not understand how she could have been so weak as to agree to it. A love affair with a man who was already engaged! He might as well be married. Weck had passed since he had promised to speak to his mother. Of course, everything hinged on her conduct.

"But that's ridiculous, too," thought Sonia. "The idea that any woman, even his mother, could force a man to be engaged against his will."

It would have been easier to believe if she had not seen Genevieve Erickson. But the girl was lovely. She was no washed-out clinging vine, as Sonia, for some reason, had imagined her, but a charming girl, with a definite personality, and evidently used to attention.

"And he's giving it to her," continued Sonia, stabbing at her own heart. "He wouldn't tell me his kisses are like a brother's."

When Violet announced that this was where they had come in Sonia
