"THE LOVE PENDULUM"

BY MARION RUBINCAM

TRIALS

Chapter 97

The spring should always be a time for happiness, I felt. The unhappiness of everything now was only intensified by the glorious weather. The warm sun chilled me, the radiant blue sky mocked me, the groups of children that laughed and played in the park added to my depression.

One springtime, everything I wanted in the world had come to me—the next, the destruction of all I loved. And now, the destruction seemed complete, confirmed.

And with the lengthening days my restlessness increased. Once I found a certain amount of relief in going out. Indeed, in my reaction against the petty, vicious gossip of Wellsville and its depressing narrowness, I had gone everywhere I was asked. To an extent I had even liked it. Now even that relief ceased.

"Restlessness is the worst feeling in the world," I said to Colin one afternoon when he dropped in at my apartment. It was delightfully warm outside. I had the studio window open and the clear air carried a breath of the hills above the city into the room. "Restlessness, being a form of discontent, is therefore divine," Colin answered.

AT THE PRINCE EDWARD

Wednesday and Thursday

"Oh, don't moralize," I exclaimed, "I'm not." Colin laughed at that, and his laugh, as usual, drove away my crossness.

"I'm an awful burden on you," I apologized. "I inflict all my moods on you, and if they're bad moods you get me out of them."

"This mood seems unusually bad," Colin remarked, hunting about for his cigarette case. "Something should be done. What are all those letters on the table?"

"Invitations to places I don't want to go."

Colin picked up the mail, looking at the envelopes and dropping them one by one on the table again. At last he held up a large square envelope addressed to me in masculine handwriting, the letters of which were all up and down lines. "This is evidently from the weakest and most feminine woman you know," he observed. "That sort of characterless woman always disguises herself behind an aggressive handwriting. Go spend the week-end with her and you'll come away pleased with your own strength of mind instead of discouraged with it."

I began to laugh at that.

"It's from Nedda. I know her writing is affected, but she isn't characterless. They're opening their new place on Long Island, Longchamps. She wants me to go to a visit."

Colin answer was to go to my desk and hunt a time table. Before I could protest, he had wired an acceptance and sent Ellen to pack my suitcase.

So it was due to Colin that I spent the next morning on a broad terrace before a long, rambling brick house, built in the fashion considered smartest that season. Other terraces stretched below me in steps and ended in a garden carefully made to look "wild" with a winding path and led to the sea-shore—a fenced off, so Nedda could have a private ocean. Nedda herself was explaining the house.

"Every bedroom has its private sitting room and bath, and some have little boudoirs as well. I wanted to put a piano in every private sitting room, but my husband wouldn't pay for it. Nedda always said 'my husband' these days with a little twist in her voice that made the term a sting.

"Why a piano? Most people can't play and those that can wouldn't want to."

"So he said. But I was sure it was the money. Anyway, I made him give me a special necklace with what he saved on the pianos."

"Nedda! You sound so—"

"Greedy. Say it, Connie. Why do you hesitate? I know I'm greedy."

"You've got one of the handsomest estates in the whole eastern part of the country—and you're already noted for your jewels—"

"Yes, but I need more for the thing I'm after. Besides, if I don't use up all my husband's income, it goes on some other woman. If I don't make myself part of all his interests, even when they bore me to death, someone else steps in. I have to amuse him and occupy him every moment. If I don't—I lose him."

I looked at her curiously. Her clear, pretty eyes were cold as ice; her firm sweet mouth was growing hard. Nedda became handsomer every day, but she no longer radiated a warm personality. She glittered with the hard cold radiance of a diamond.

Others had trials too! I looked out over the terraces to the sparkle of sun on the blue water. Nedda had done very well for herself. White peacocks strutted on the terrace below, swans floated over a tiny lake in a woods to our right, her footmen were in livery, her place was an expensive and luxurious as she could make it. Nedda liked this sort of life—yet she was no happier than I.

"If one marries for love—" I began. Her lip curled.
