DELAYED FERTILIZER APPLICATIONS

Lack of labor on the farm, unfavorable weather at planting time, congestion and strikes on railroads and consequent delays to shipment may prevent the full and proper amount of fertilizer being applied to the crop at time of planting.

A late application of fertilizer as a side-dressing to rowed crops, or as a top-dressing for other crops, is often quite as effective as when applied at planting or seeding time.

Certainly it is much better and wiser to make the delayed fertilizer application in this way than to attempt to grow a crop with no fertilizer at all, or with less than the usual quantity. Fertilizer conserves farm labor by making it more productive. The big problem is to apply the fertilizer with the least possible amount of labor, but at such time, and in such a way, as to make it more effective.

—Market Growers' Journal. It pays to be good; if you get in to the penitentiary it shortens your term.

FERTILIZERS LOWER THE LABOR COST OF PRODUCTION

Referring to the subject of lowering the cost of producing a bushel or ton of farm produce we quote the following extract from a resolution adopted at a recent meeting of the Indiana Corn Growers' Association:

Be it resolved—First, Recognizing the great problems now confronting the world in connection with the supply of food and the cost of same, we recommend that each individual farmer, and groups of farmers, make a careful study of the needs for greater production to the end that the unit of production may be materially increased, this to apply to the production of meat animals as well as grain crops. This increased production is always at a less cost per unit and will serve the purpose of a greater supply of foodstuffs, enable the farmer to make a greater profit, and at the same time dispose of his products to the ultimate consumer at a less cost.

THE LOVELY MONTH OF JUNE.

All in the lovely month of June, The singing birds the woods at tune;

We love to hear these wabblers sing, Which pleasant feelings to us bring.

Now passed away is winter's gloom, And woods and fields appear in bloom;

Upon the trees is wealth of leaves, Fluttering in the summer breeze.

The wind comes soft o'er hill and vale, And flowers and grasses gently

And pleasing 'tis to view each scene, When nature's clad in living green.

The winter's icy blast is o'er, His chilling blows are felt no more;

But balmy breezes from the sea, Move gently o'er the verdant lea.

The cultivated fields are green; The tender blade on them is seen, Waving so gently in the breeze, Like the tiny ripples on the seas.

With clover also, white and red, The fields are beautifully flecked, All nature looks so fresh and fair, And light and healthful is the air.

The apple trees in bloom appear, In all the orchards, far and near; Laden with blossoms are the trees, And petals flying in the breeze.

Low down the berry blossoms peep, The showers and moistening dews to greet, They look so pure and white and clean,

When by the showers they washed have been.

The lilac bush is blooming sweet, The loveliest tree own eyes to greet, Its lively colors purple-white, To the observer gives delight.

The flowers appear upon the earth, Received from nature a new birth, In winter buried in the ground, But now in all the meadows found.

No tongue their beauty can declare, For God has made them very fair; E'en Solomon takes second place,

When with the flowers he's in the race.

They cast their odor on the breeze, Which nasal senses ever please, And thus they pleasure to us bring, And then we praise to them

Beautiful is the forest hoary, When all nature's robed in glory, When the sun pours his golden rays, On leafy trees in summer days.

I love to roam in forests deep, And get at the blue sky a peep, And hear the music of the leaves, When winds blow soft among the trees.

The fleecy clouds 'tis nice to see, Driven by winds on ether sea, Casting their shadows on the earth, Which the eye follows with delight.

These are an emblem of frail man, Whose time on earth is but a span; They pass on to the other side, We look in vain, we can't them find.

So sweet and peaceful is each scene, In June, of months the most serene, When nature stands in living green, As she had first in Eden been.

Yet in June there's sometimes a storm, When dark clouds gather up and form, And vivid lightnings from them flash, Followed by the loud thunder's crash.

And then the rain in torrents falls, Sometimes accompanied by squalls; The dust is settled down complete, And fields and forests look so sweet.

Truly June is a lovely month, With balmy breezes from the South, And though men can't tell whence they came, We get their comfort all the same.

The various scenes our fancy please, Our interest in all increase, Administer to us delight, We praise the God that gave us sight.

All nature is so gaily dressed, The fields have by the Lord been blessed, Such beauty by Jehovah given, But a faint emblem is of Heaven.
