At night, when the wind howled and trees wailed in their distress, he sweated in fear, and more than once the thought came to him to abandon his family and go in search of Toinette. His visions of the fate which might be overtaking her became almost unbearable. His hunts were not long now, and seldom took him more than three or four miles from the cabin, for his own strength was ebbing. His only hope was to kill an occasional bird, and it was in the darkest hour that an answer came to his prayers. In a blizzard against which he was working his way in half-blindness, he stumbled upon a doe as weak as himself and killed her. Without this stroke of fortune, Wood Pigeon and Wuskoob must have died. When the thaws came they were alive. Raccoons began to appear and fleshy roots could be gathered out of the opening streams. Early March brought a warm break in which Jeems and his companions started for Chenusio. Food was plentiful on the way, and each night they gathered strengthening sap from the maples. They arrived at Chenusio. The people there had lived frugally on their supplies, and from the first, running of the maple sap had been making sugar. Only four families had preceded Jeems to the village, and of their number, which was twenty-eight, five had died. No word had been received from Tiagoa and his warriors.

The maple sap ran steadily. In spite of this opening grace of spring, there hung over Chenusio a grim specter whose shadow grew darker with each day that passed.

The specter was death. Scarcely a family returned which did not bring grief with it. And Ah De Bah, the mightiest hunter of them all, did not come. No one had heard of him. No one knew where he was. Fifty—seventy—a hundred—and then a hundred and fifty of those who had gone in the break-up were accounted for by the end of March. Among them was Mary Daghlen. Of their number, thirty had died. Still Ah De Bah, the Tall Man, did not come.

Then he appeared one day. He was a grotesque rack of fleshless bones whom Tiagoa would not have recognized. Behind him trailed his people. Jeems counted them before he could tell one from another. Eleven! He ran toward them, and Toinette swayed from the line at the head of which the Tall Man marched. He might not have known her at first if she had not met him behind Ah De Bah walked with bowed heads and dragging steps like death figures in a weird parade. Her eyes stared at him from a face so strange and thin that it choked his joy. Her body was not heavier than a child's when he clasped her. Then she began to cry softly with her face against his breast.

He carried her to the tepee. Her clothes were in tatters, heroccasins worn to shreds. She was so small a burden that her lightness sent horror through him and his eyes were blinded by a hot fire when she raised a cold hand to touch his face. He placed her on the soft skins in the tepee, then he was conscious of Wood Pigeon near him, in a moment Mary Daghlen came in, Jeems made way for them. He went outside, and in his path was a creature who leapt weakly against him. It was Odd, a skeleton with red and watery eyes and jaws falling apart. Jeems waited until the Thrush came out and told him she was going for warm water and food and that Wood Pigeon was undressing Toinette. Then he sought the others. All but Ah De Bah had disappeared and were being cared for. The Tall Man could scarcely stand as he told his story. He had brought his eleven people back alive—the dog and he. Like the truly great, he gave credit to his inferior.

Without the dog, he would have failed in his struggle to feed eleven mouths—and Jeems knew why Odd had not been eaten.

After a time Mary Daghlen let him see Toinette again. She was in her bed of skins. The look which had frightened him was gone from her eyes, and they were bright with the joy of his presence. She held out her arms to him, and he knelt beside her. Wood Pigeon looked at the two with shining eyes, and a soft mist gathered in Mary Daghlen's. After this, Jeems did not see Toinette again for an afternoon and a night. During this time she slept, and the Thrush and Wood Pigeon were never far from her side. The next day she waked with him about the town.

What was in Toinette's heart was also in Mary Daghlen's. The young girl who had known no other life than that of her adopted people since babyhood, but whose mother had kept God and Church alive in her soul, watched with increasing anxiety for the return of Shindas, and she told Toinette that at last she was prepared to yield to her environment, and if no priest came that spring or summer she would marry Shindas in the Indian way.

ON THE SECOND OF THESE DAYS HE MARRIED JEEMS AND TOINETTE

This thought now held less of horror for Toinette. She had seen the fidelity and courage of an Indian family in its struggle against death; she had seen the Tall Man gnaw bit ter bark that the women and children might have scraps of skin and flesh; she had seen a mother hide her portion of food day after day that she might save it for her children; she had witnessed a faith and devotion which could have been inspired by nothing less than the strength of God in their souls. Her prejudices melted away in spite of the tragedy, and she began to experience emotions which could have been nothing of it to Jeems, the con- victious was growing in her heart that she would not allow another winter to separate them, even if a priest did not come to Chenusio.

But he came, following closely the months of starvation. He was a gaunt, death-faced man, on his way to take the place of a brother who had died among the Indians of the Ohio. That was what he said. History was to relate otherwise, for a year later he was the force behind the Abenakis in their slaughter of the English at Fort William Henry. His name was Father Pierre Roubaud. He was a cold, terrible man of God. Yet he was the Church. He would have died a thousand deaths for the Cause of which he was the spiritual if not the moral representative. He would have eaten human flesh in defense of it. He did see such flesh eaten by his savage disciples at Fort William Henry. He remained in Chenusio two days. On the second of these days he married Jeems and Toinette according to the ritual of the Catholic Church.

The gloom he brought with him was dissipated by this event. Chenusio gave itself up to a few hours of rejoicing in honor of Tiagoa's daughter and the son of Wuskoob. But this happier spirit could not endure long with the people. Death had settled on them heavily. No word had come from Tiagoa and his warriors. There were whisperings that they had been annihilated in

at 1/2 the price of the #2 Kroman

Now the Gillette Blue Super-Blade makes it inexpensive for every man to enjoy extraordinary shaving comfort. This exceptional blade—selling for half the price of the famous $2 Kroman DeLuxe—is distinctly an extra quality product offered in addition to the regular blade in the green package.

New production methods perfected by the new management and gratifying acceptance by shavers everywhere enable us to offer the Blue Super-Blade at its bargain price. The selling cost was based upon estimated volume and it is most pleasing to know that you have recognized the blade as a real value.

The Blue Super-Blade is a great manufacturing achievement—the product of rare engineering and manufacturing skill. It is a sturdy and heavier blade—made to give you shaving comfort impossible to describe. The edges are harder than the flexing center. This feature—protected by patents already granted—enables the blade to bend without distortion while the outside sections—of an entirely different temper—take and hold sturdier, keener shaving edges.

The Blue Super-Blade is made of blue steel with rustless finish. Every reel of steel is tested by an exclusive photo-electric process that allows no flaw to escape. Automatic grinding, honing, finishing and stropping are so arranged that critical inspection after every operation is possible.

You'll enjoy your first trial of the Blue Super-Blade. Look for it in its blue package, Cellophane wrapped. Your dealer can supply you. We urge you to buy a package now and begin to enjoy rare shaving comfort immediately. On sale everywhere, $1 for 10, 50¢ for 5.

St. Lawrence Waterways Treaty

(Canadian Press)
OTTAWA, July 12—Conversations between Canada and the United States towards a treaty for construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterways scheme are proceeding satisfactorily, it was officially stated tonight. Negotiations between the Dominion and Ontario governments on the proposal, it was further stated, are practically completed.

Officially, there is no further comment tonight on the St. Lawrence project; but in certain quarters the feeling continues to prevail that an early announcement of the signing of the treaty between the two countries may be made. With regard to the exchange of communications between President Herbert Hoover and his Democratic opponent for the presidency, Franklin D. Roosevelt, on the subject, the official attitude is not to interject itself into these exchanges.
