The success of the slam contract in today's deal depended solely on an entry-preserving play.

however, did not cover, and now declarer was very much up against it. He could not afford to unblock with the jack or ten, but when he played the four-spot, he was forced to win the next trump lead in his own hand. This meant that he could not possibly capture East's trump king (since there was no way to return to dummy) and the contract was therefore automatically defeated.

South had overlooked a highly important point of entry management. The proper trump lead from dummy was the nine, not the queen! If East covered the nine with the king it would be easy to draw trumps; and if East did not cover the nine declarer would, as before, follow suit with the four-spot and then lead the trump queen through East. The latter would now be absolutely helpless, because dummy would be assured of another lead if East failed to cover.
