Married Quarters

By DAVID LYALL

Continued

"He is wiser than you, and he is right, Poppy. It has all been a mistake and will have to be put in the grave beside other mistakes. Life is full of them. It is because you are only at the beginning of things that you take it so badly."

Poppy snatched her letter and flew off without so much as a good-bye. Ruth, smiling faintly, watched the flying figure across the park, the pink silk jersey making a speck of colour against the green of the trees. It was impossible to forecast the issue of such an affair.

Everything, she felt, depended on Jim Bradford's strength to hold out. But her heart was heavy, and a little sigh of apprehension fluttered from her lips.

Poppy, in no mood to let the matter drop had suddenly conceived a daring proposition to consult her mother regarding a neutral case.

Lady Augusta spent hours in her boudoir with her secretary, Miss Benthall, who occupied a nondescript position in the house. The daughter of a small farmer on the estate, she had been employed as a needlewoman, but, having taught herself shorthand and typewriting, had been promoted to the post of private secretary to Lady Augusta. It was not a hard situation, judged from the standpoint of actual work, but Lady Augusta was a trifle capricious and exacting, and had a good many of the whims of a great lady.

She also entertained an exalted idea of her own importance, which had been accentuated since so much war work was thrust upon her. She was the organising head of a great many war charities, and sat on numerous committees, and even in a small way essayed public speaking. She was dictating a speech to be delivered at an August conference, at which all the heads of the war work in the country were to gather, when Poppy burst in.

"Dear me, child, what a whirlwind! Don't you see I'm busy with Emily Benthall?"

"Sorry, Mummy, but I want to ask you something dreadfully."

"Well, come back in a quarter of an hour. You have interrupted a most important thesis."

Poppy reluctantly withdrew, and so impatient was she of delay that she very nearly went in search of her father to sound him on the subject. But his opinion, after all, could never be final, her mother being the arbiter of Cudham destiny.

Emily Benthall came to seek her when, at the end of twenty minutes her mother was ready. The boudoir was a large, comfortable room, hung in chintz, with immense long-tailed blue birds strutting about in impetuous garçons, r. nae on Persian rugs on the floor, and abounded in the kind of treasures found in such family rooms with a history behind them. Poppy suddenly beheld in imagination the house above the shop in the place she persisted in calling Stony Markyate, and a very odd expression settled on her small, cameo-like face.

"I'm ready for you now, my dear. What is it?" asked Lady Augusta in rather a judicial tone. She was pleased to have a little respite from what had been a gargantuan task. She positively laboured to bring forth the feeble public utterances on which she imagined the public breathlessly hung.

"It isn't anything very deadly, Mummy," murmured Poppy. "I only wanted your advice about a friend of mine, one of the men who was at Auntie Vic's."

Lady Augusta looked at her child narrowly, but Poppy, developing histrionic powers, met the inquiry calmly.

"Of course, you know we get rather friendly with them nursing them, and when they're nice, like this one was they tell us things about themselves and their people. This one was particularly nice," she went on, with a purr in her voice. "His people are in trade somewhere up North, but you'd never think it to look at him. Well, he fell in love with somebody above him socially, some one he had only met since he has been an officer."

Poppy paused there, and her mother nodded her head sagely.

"I quite understand that it must occasionally happen. I have often reflected on the dangers arising out of these strange new conditions. Of course, one wishes to be kind to these splendid men who are defending us, but at the same time it is necessary to guard against unpleasant complications. I have often deplored it, but neither your father nor your Aunt Victoria seem to take it seriously."

"Aunt Vic is a perfect dear, and they all love her," said Poppy, with conviction; "but I must get on with my story. He fell in love with this girl and she with him, and he told her—"

"That was very wrong; and what happened?"

"Nothing; it didn't get any further because you see, they both concluded that the girl was too wide to be bridged."

"How sensible of them! Then there is really no story. Why have you mentioned it?"

"Only because I felt so dreadfully sorry for him."

"How did he come to be confiding in you?"

"I don't know. I suppose he thought I'd understand," answered Poppy, without a trace of confusion. "I really advised him quite sensibly. I told him I didn't see how they could ever be happy, and advised them to part."

"Admirable, my child; then has he taken your advice?"

"Yes, I think he has. I heard from him to-day. And now I'm not at all sure whether I had the right to say as much as I did. Couldn't some sort of compromise have been made?"

Lady Augusta shook her head most emphatically.

"Compromise in an affair of that kind is positively fatal. Just look at poor Beau's case. The upsetting of the social order ordained by God makes a great deal of the misery of life."
