SYNOPSIS

All New York society is talking of the beautiful young woman who has been seen at every first night performance recently. She is said to be the image of Mary Ogden, a belle of thirty years ago who had married a Count Zattiany; but all attempts to establish her identity prove futile. Clavering, a newspaper columnist finally manages to meet her and immediately falls in love. As time goes on he discovers that she reciprocates his feeling. He asks her to marry him and this finally forces her to reveal her identity. She herself is Mary Ogden, restored to youth by the famous Steinach gland operation. Summoning all her courage she pours forth to Clavering the whole story of her girlhood, her unhappy marriage with Zattiany, her subsequent love affairs abroad, of her war work and its toll of her health and finally of the amazing operation which has brought back her youth, of body if not of mind. Clavering is shocked by the revelation, but still in love.

Next morning he receives a summons from his old friend, Mrs. Oglethorpe, a contemporary of Mary Ogden's. She is worried about her flapper granddaughter, Janet, who has declared her intention of marrying Clavering. Jim Oglethorpe, who, in a tardy attempt at discipline, has locked his unruly daughter in her room, bursts in with the news that Janet has escaped. After an unsuccessful search of Janet's haunts Clavering and Oglethorpe proceed to Clavering's rooms—and there they find her. Her plan to force Clavering to marry her by being "compromised" is completely frustrated by her father's presence, and she is wild fury.

Continued

"Why isnt your head turned?" Clavering asked her one day when the sensation was about a month old and was beginning to expire journalistically for want of fresh fuel. (Not a woman in New York could be induced to admit that she was taking the treatment.) "You are the most famous woman in America and the pioneer of a revolution that may have lasting and momentous consequences on which we can only speculate vaguely today. I don't believe you are as unmoved as you look. It's not in woman's nature—in human nature. Publicity goes to the head and then descends to the marrow of the bones."

"I'm not unmoved. I've been tremendously interested and excited. I find that newspaper notoriety is the author of a distinctly new sensation." And then she felt a disposition to play with fire. Clavering was in one of his rare detached moods, and had evidently come for an hour of agreeable companionship. "I am beginning to get a little bored and tired. If it were not for this Vienna Fund—and to the newspapers for their assistance I am eternally grateful—I believe I'd suggest that we leave for Austria tomorrow."

"And I wouldn't go." Clavering stood on the hearthrug smiling down at her with humorous defiance. "You switched me on to that play, and there I stick until it is finished. No chance for it in a honeymoon, and no chance for undiluted happiness with that crashing round inside my head."

She shrank and turned cold, but recovered herself sharply and dismissed the pang. It was her first experience in her exhaustive knowledge of men, of the writing temperament; and after all it was part of the novelty of the man who had obliterated every other from her mind. Nor had she any intention of letting him see that he could hurt her. She smiled sweetly and asked:

"How is it coming on? Are you satisfied with it?"

"Yes I am. And so is Gora Dwight. I've finished two acts and I read them to her last night."

"Ah? Your Egeria!"

"Not a bit of it. But she's a wise cold-blooded critic. You can't blame me for not even talking about it to you. I see so little of you that I've no intention of wasting any of the precious time."

"But you might let me read it."

"I'd rather wait until it's finished and as polished and perfect as I can make it. I always want you to know me at my best."

"Oh, my dear! You forget that we are to be made one and remain twain. Do you really believe that we shall either of us always be at our best?

"Well, to tell you the truth I don't care a hang whether we are or not. I'll have you, and all to myself. And I won't say 'for a while, at least.' Do you imagine that when we return to New York I'm going to let Society take possession of you again? Not only shall I work harder than I've ever worked before, but I'd see little more of you than I do now. And that I'll never submit to again. I'll write my next play inside this house, and you'll be here when I want you, not gadding about."

She felt a sudden pang of dismay, apprehension. New York? She realized that not for a moment had she given up her original purpose. But why disturb the serenity of the present? When she had him in the Dolomites. . . . She answered him in the same light tone.

"I'm having my last fling at New York Society. When we return we'll give our spare time to the Sophisticates. I see far less of them now than I like."

Then, with a further desire to investigate the literary temperament even if she were stabbed again in the process, she looked at him with provocative eyes and said: "I've sometimes wondered why you haven't insisted upon a secret marriage. I'm told it can be done with a reasonable prospect of success in certain states."

"Don't imagine I didn't think of it - - - but—well—I think the play would go fluey . . . you see. - - - "

"I see! And what about your next?"

"The next will be a comedy. I'll never be able to write a tremendously emotional play again."

"And meanwhile you will not deny that the artist has submerged the lover."

"I admit nothing of the sort. But you yourself let the artist loose—and what in God's name should I be doing these cursed weeks if you hadn't? You know you never would have consented to a secret marriage. You've set your heart on the Dolomites. - - - How about that interval of travel, by the way? Liners and trains are not particularly conducive to illusions."

"I thought I'd told you. My plan is to be married there. I shall go on a preceding steamer and see that the Lodge was in proper condition. I want everything to be quite perfect, and Heaven only knows what has happened to it."

"Oh! This is a new one you've sprung. But—yes—I like the idea. I'd rather dreaded the prelude." And then he made one of those abrupt vaultings out of one mood into another which had fascinated her from the first. "God! I wish we were there now. When I'm not writing——! How many men have you got in love with you already? But no. I don't care. When I'm here—like this. Mary, like this—I don't care a hang if I never write another line."

MISUNDERSTANDING

Chapter 63

But Claire avoided the subject of Jim Clarke. All she would say was,—

"Jim is perfectly all right. Luther had no reason to be jealous of him."

Instinctively, her fingers went to a great sapphire ring she was wearing, a ring Mrs. Talbot had not seen before, a ring obviously too expensive for Luther to have afforded.

It was a sign of the growing cleverness of the older woman, that she noticed that slight action of Claire's. Ordinarily it would have meant nothing. Now she connected the thought in Claire's brain that unconsciously sent her hand to touch the ring Jim had given her.

With this knowledge in her mind, Mrs. Talbot began again.

"It seems to me that if Luther objected to him, with or without reason, the least you could do would be to not to see him."

Claire pouted.

Jim had meant a lot to her. He had given her presents, pretty things she adored; he had taken her off for long rides in his motor and good naturedly, had driven her around town in the afternoons while she went shopping or calling. She liked to hear the soft purr of the engine, it sounded like a gigantic contented kitten while they waited for the traffic block to break. She liked to be in the car when the traffic policemen at the big cross streets touched their caps and saluted George by name—that made her feel enormously important.

And she liked to see the long, low motor waiting outside the shop, and to have Jim stand around making amusing comments while she tried on hats or held up her pretty hand for the attendant to fit a glove. The sales girls were always so much more respectful to her when Jim was along; they fairly fluttered about him as well as herself, and brought out all their prettiest things, showing them to him first and asking his criticism, and smiling respectful appreciation of his witticisms.

And Claire liked to say languidly, when she had seen everything there was on display, and made her purchases—

"Yes, I'll take it with me. Just have it carried out to the car, will you?"

She thought that marrying Luther meant giving up this delightful. For it was not only luxurious and pleasant to have this good looking man go about with her, it also meant more than his companionship. He was sure to make her a present of some of the pretty trifles she spent her afternoon selecting. And he took her to tea at one of the usual smart places where the theatrical folk gathered, and where they invariably fell into a delightful party of friends.

Then there was an hour or two hours of tea, and talk, and cigarettes, gossip, and more tea and fancy little cakes by the hotel's French chef, while the day darkened and Broadway sprang into glittering lights—while she, Claire, was peasantly conscious that this afternoon Jim was her property and that the "other girls" were slightly jealous.

Some of this she tried, suddenly, to tell Mrs. Talbot. But her only reward was,

"What a waste of time!"

As for Jim, one afternoon he ran around with Claire, another afternoon with Maizie Follies, and another with Helena Gray, a graduate of a school of dramatic art, who was already making a name as an emotional actress and who was very serious minded.

"But I did give it up for Luther," Claire announced.

"Not much of a sacrifice," Mrs. Talbot responded.

She could not understand that to Claire's butterfly life, this sort of thing was necessary for existance. For an afternoon she lived the life of a rich, carefree "society woman"—as she understands that term. She was supremely happy—and Jim wasted an afternoon pleasantly. That was all either of them demanded of the hours together.

But Jim liked her more than carelessly. And after she had been married a little they began spending afternoons in his car again. This time Claire shopped for puffy silk cushions for the living room, proper hangings for the guest room windows—Jim took as much pleasure in helping her select these things as he did criticizing the angle of the hats she used to try on for his benefit.

It was amazing generosity on his part, to Claire. To Luther, it was a cause for rankling jealousy.

"His letters were only amusing gossip of the people I knew," Claire said. "If he called me 'darling Claire' it was just his way. It meant nothing. But Luther made me miserable for days about it.

"He wants me to stay home all the time. But there's nothing to do here. I hate housework, and I can't read or sew all the time. It's such a bore!"

"You might learn something useful," Mrs. Talbot answered.

Sunday School Lesson

Dec. 30

(Optional Lesson)

"THE WORLD FOR CHRIST"

Golden Text: — "They shall utter the memory of Thy great goodness and shall sing of Thy righteousness." Psalms cxl:7.

Scripture Reading: —Titus ii 11-14.

This lesson is designed for those who do not wish to take up the regular quarterly review in detail. It at the same time, embraces a summing up of the interesting series of missionary studies which have occupied the past weeks, under the title "The World for Christ."

Let us first take note of the growth of the Kingdom. The beginning of the great missionary movement was when Jesus Christ gathered about him twelve young men, and after a period of instruction and communion, said "Go and make disciples of all nations." From that beginning it spread, through zeal and through persecution; through famine and sword; through choice and through necessity. The gospel of Jesus Christ reached even little Angle-land, touching Saxon, Scots, Teutons, Northmen, Slavs and others until Europe became Christianized.

The Reformation which years later started under the leadership of Wycliffe, Martin Luther and others was a great home mission to Christiandom and tended to purify and enlighten the church. The plant of Christianity grew and flourished among the more aggressive races of the earth and the result has been a worldwide effort at evangelization and an attempt to reach with the gospel, the uttermost parts of the earth.

Now for a brief survey of world-wide evangelism as seen in the unfolding history of the centuries. It took a thousand years to give the gospel to fifty million people. To accomplish such a task with the limited facilities of that period was a triumph for the new religion. In the next 500 years by Christ's aid, more was accomplished than in the preceding thousand years. At the Reformation time one hundred million people had heard the glad tidings of the Gospel. The next three hundred years saw as much accomplished as in the preceding fifteen hundred years.

Now comes the most wonderful statement of all: In the past century the gospel of Jesus Christ has witnessed a greater spread than in all the preceding eighteen hundred years. According to statistics, one hundred million had heard the gospel at the beginning of the sixteenth the century, and two hundred millions at the beginning of the nineteenth century. At least five hundred million people have heard today that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

History shows that the missionary church is the progressive church, and that missions are not an occasional duty, but an essential of the Christian life. The early Puritans were a very religious people; zealous for the religion of Jesus Christ; careful over their personal walk and conversation. They landed in North America with their minds full of religious problems. They were so self-centred that they made practically no attempt at missionary work, even among the Indians with whom they came in contact. They became entangled in controversy over dogmas and ended in confusion amid which they eventually to a certain extent lost their religious identity.

Man is made Christian by the grace of God. For what purpose? The command "Go ye" is just as imperative to the children of God today as it was when spoken by the greatest of all missionary teachers, and those who cannot go, can at least find some practical way in which to aid in the spreading of the good tidings so that it may reach those who dwell in the uttermost parts of the earth. Even the littliest child may be a missionary.
