VETERAN IS STABBED TO DEATH BY WOMAN.

MONTREAL, May 21.—J. J. Lowe, a forty-year member of the 13th Battalion Royal Highlanders of Canada, was stabbed to the heart during a brawl in a Chinese restaurant on St. Urban street last week and died as he was being admitted to the hospital.

Grace Bianco, 28, of 12 Clarke street, is under arrest.

Lowe is said to have met the Bianco woman and another and to have gone with them to the restaurant. An altercation arose and the woman ran out pursued by Lowe who cried "they have stolen five dollars from me."

As Lowe caught up to the woman one of them struck back quickly and Lowe fell. The women ran away but were traced to 12 Clarke street.

An Adventure In Years

BY CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter XXI

Sonia breathed a sigh of relief when she was once more at home. She had given up the struggle. Ned was not for her. She had a brooding look as if she had lost touch with her surroundings. In those last days of the house party he had wavered toward her often, but in the end had devoted himself to Lenore.

It was only natural, even though it awoke in her a perfect storm of rebellion. When the storm passed she prayed to feel—just nothing it was only natural that youth should seek youth, natural that she should lose her hour—she had made it so herself. She wondered why people said that those who have up happiness were noble. She had that feeling. She felt on a heartbreak, a wish to efface herself.

Her sensation of loss, of weariness persisted. Life was slipping by and it had brought her—nothing. Another page had been turned in her book of life, that was all blank like the others. Her weariness she recognized as an unconscious sign of an unusual depression, caused by her renunciation of all that to her might mean happiness.

She had realized a suppressed force in Ned, something new and different in him a something that every woman admires in a man. Even Mrs. Clarke had noticed and spoken of it. She had also noticed his attentions to Lenore Fleetwood and spoken of that. She said:

"It would be a fine match in every way—age, money, position. They are exactly suited to each other."

"Yes, they are suited to each other," Sonia had halted her thoughts, her attention at the word age. Yes, they were nearly the same age and therefore suited to each other.

One wonders if men, in their supreme egotism, their youthful ardency, ever could understand the gulf a few years fixes in the mind of a sensitive woman. A man of seventy-five has no hesitation in asking a girl of twenty to keep him entertained at the price of a dinner, or to be the companion of his old age at the price of his fortune. But let a woman be even five years older than the man and she immediately feels ages older.

Sonia never doubted that Ned liked her very much. But the moment he was gone doubts assailed her, she was unhappy. On her heart the dust lay thick, her thoughts were for the most part sad ones. It was becoming unbearable.

"I blow hot, I blow cold," she said to herself. "I must make up my mind to give up all thoughts of him." And she would try for days. Then he would come to her, be something like the old boyish Ned she had known, and all her good resolutions were gone.

One evening they dined with Mrs. Clarke. After dinner Sonia sang song after song. She never had sung better. Ned took her home and she asked him to come in for a while. He thanked her in a way that brought the blood to her cheeks.

"I was very proud of you," he said finally, his voice softer than usual.

"I'm delighted."

"You have an exquisite voice—and I felt somehow as if you were—singing to me."

"I was," she answered, very low. "Sonia will you marry me?"

"The question came as a shock almost too great to be borne. It had not been thus she had thought; of him as wooing her. This abrupt question.

Her face flamed. "I am too old for you, Ned," she said after a moment. She said it very quietly, although something inside of her kept telling her: "Say yes! He may never ask you again." And "You'll lose him if you refuse him now."

"What's a few years?" he asked in a boyish tone that insensibly accentuated those years.

"It is nothing perhaps—now. But ten years from now, Ned—then it would mean unhappiness for both. No, Ned, (my dear boy, it won't do. When you marry you must marry some one young—as young or younger than yourself. Then when you are older, she will not seem too old for you, you will not be tempted to cast her aside for some one younger."

"Nonsense!"

"No, sense."

Ned dropped the subject as suddenly as he had proposed it. He commenced talking of some people they knew, retelling a bit of gossip he had heard, and which he thought would interest her.

The incongruity of it all struck Sonia. How little he really cared, she thought. Even though he had so carelessly accepted her refusal her heart was beating fast because of his offer; her cheeks felt like burning coals as she touched them with her hands.

"You are very different, Ned from what you were before you went away," she said when he rose to go.

"War changes men—perhaps it changes women, too. You are also different."

URGES STEPS TOWARDS LIMITING NAVAL ARMAMENTS

CHICAGO, May 21.—The Congress on the reduction of armaments today adopted a resolution urging President Harding to invite Great Britain and Japan to an immediate conference looking to the limiting of naval armaments. The congress pledged its support by every possible means to a policy of armament reduction by agreement between the nations.

The resolution deprecated the universal misery and suffering in the world and declared that it was the immediate duty of all nations to find a practical means of substituting for suicidal competition of increasing armaments, a policy of justice and brotherhood.

The resolution also pointed out that the treaty of Versailles obligated the signatory powers to limit armaments that Japan had indicated a willingness to confer with Britain and the United States on naval armament limitation and that President Harding in his message to congress had favored cooperation with other nations for approximate disarmament.

For the "Lean Season"

For the time of retrenchment, when the purse strings must be held tightly to meet new industrial conditions, eat for breakfast with milk, for lunch with green vegetables, for dinner with sliced bananas, berries or other fruits. Try this diet for a few days and you will be ahead in purse, in health and in strength. Shredded Wheat is 100 per cent whole wheat, prepared in digestible form.

TRISCUIT is the shredded wheat cracker, a crisp whole-wheat toast, eaten with butter or soft cheese.
