Like a breath of peace and tranquillity is the November Canadian Magazine. The first article deals with "The Argentine Gaucho," a peculiar character who lives on the ranches and prairies of our great South American continent in wheat-growing. The illustrations for this article are executed by one, A. Theodore Waters, a Canadian in British Tongaland, tells how he "orked" his way to South Africa via London, how he studied the Zulu language and how he fared there in wartime. There are some rare photographs with this article. The editor gives his impressions of Canada's display at St. Louis. There is a short history of the Grenadier Guards, the oldest regiment in the British Army. The Canadian Celebrity of the month is Mr. Robert Meighen. There are splendid portraits of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Borden, of Earl Grey and Lady Grey, and a new portrait of Marshall Saunders. The stories are worthy of the number.

The subject debated was, "Which is the more destructive fire or water." The speakers were numerous, arguments for the most part logical though at times attempts were made to evade the question. The debate proved exceedingly interesting on account of the information which the speakers had evidently procured from standard works. Mr. Clarke was leader of those who maintained that water wrought the most destruction, while Miss Sobey led the opposition. Among the speakers were Miss Bolger, Miss Orr, Mr. Dunstan, Mr. Downess and Mr. Brehaut. The question was well threshed out in all its phases. The vote result was an overwhelming majority for fire.
