The Promoter's Wife

BY JANE PHELPH

MRS. CARTER RETURNS HOME AT LAST CHAPTER CV

Aunt had gone. Neil had been too busy to go to the station when she left, but Robert and I had driven there with her, and I had bought her all the late magazines, and a basket of fruit to help her pass the time pleasantly on her long lonely journey. I was fond of her, yet it was with a sense of relief that I turned away from bidding her good bye. She had been with us so long, Neil had become so impatient of her questions, well meant though they were, and I had grown tired of never being alone.

There are people who never want to be isolated, to whom staying alone is a real punishment. But I was not one of those. It was restful to know that I could read or sew without interruption. I only hated my evenings alone. I had felt always that Neil should give me his society after dinner. Either at home, or that we should go out together. I knew now that she had gone I should have to spend many of them alone. Although I hoped to persuade Neil to remain with me more often than he had while she was with us. He had felt no responsibility then. He knew I never was alone.

Blanche Orton called the day after aunt left. She expressed her sorrow at missing her, then said:

"I have wanted to come and see you ever since—that night you came to my house." She had hesitated and flushed. I too flushed as she referred to my uninvited appearance. "It was a very brave thing to do—considering."

"Considering what?" I asked. "Considering you knew you would meet the very people you had refused to entertain yourself. I'm not so squeamish. I can't afford to be. But your frank admission that you wanted to help Neil—Mr. Forbes, made me like you better than I ever had before, and so I am going to trust you."

"Trust me?" I returned, wondering.

"Yes, trust you! Strange isn't it? I suppose you have thought that because I was unconventional that I was not quite—well, not quite all right."

right. That because I received those people I was one of them—like them. I wouldn't blame you if you had, don't try to deny it. I had made a gesture of dissent. "You know that I love luxury, dress, good food and service. I am miserable without these things. Well Mr. Orton left me almost a beggar. I thought, he had plenty of money. He never told me much of his affairs. I supposed when he died I could go right on living just as I had been doing. I could—for a month or two. Then you gave me the means to go on living in the way to which I was accustomed, and—"

"I gave you the means. I do not understand."

"Neil told me you objected to receiving Scott and such men at your table. You had the society bee in your bonnet, and feared to hurt yourself with people like the Powers if it were known. He said too that you were fastidious, that their manners were unbearable to you."

"They were. I could scarcely endure to sit at table with them," I admitted.

"Well Mrs. Forbes, I am fastidious too. Do you recall the day you called and I received you in negligence because I had to rest that afternoon. I had to rest so that my nerves would be in shape to play, the part I was getting paid for playing. Do you suppose I like to receive such men as Tearle and Connor? Do you imagine for a moment that these ordinary women you met at my house are the sort of women I like to entertain? If you do you do not know me. But I cannot live on air, and neither can I do anything the ordinary woman might do. I cannot go out and earn money, so I stay at home and earn it."

"You mean?" A light was dawning upon me, I was beginning to understand many things.

"I meant to put it in plain English that you husband had paid me generously for entertaining the men he could not entertain in his own home, and whom he could not entertain at his club because they were men who considered an evening incomplete without women's society, and who also wanted to gamble."

I hesitated at first—really I did. But when I considered the alternative, giving up my home, and all it meant to me I hesitated no longer. I just gritted my teeth and told Neil to go as far as he liked. I would do all I could to help him in return for the handsome reward he had offered me. But my dear you couldn't do it. So don't try. There's one other thing, after a moment, "I feared you were thinking things—about me and Neil. Don't! You wrong us both. He is as true as steel, and I—well I have other fish to fry."

I scarcely knew what to say to her, but somehow I managed to let her know I should never betray her confidence; and that I trusted Neil with her. When she went away we were nearer really liking each other than ever before. Yet she had made me very anxious. What was Neil getting from these men that he went to so much trouble? If he were giving them value received was it necessary.

Tomorrow—Once More Barbara Confides in Mr. Fredrick.
