might look as though I was just out to get business for myself. You never know what people might think in that way. No, I couldn't do that. But at the same time I'd be glad to help you any way I could. Major, if only for the memory of my old friend. When are you aiming to go to Carbonaras?

"Tomorrow," the Major told him. "I believe it has been arranged that we shall take an early train to a place called Antilla, which is as far as we can go by rail."

"Yes, that's the railroad," he said. "After that, you go on the rest of the way by auto. Well, as it happens, I've got a little deal to put through in Antilla the day after, so I shan't be so far from you. Maybe I could take a trip over to Carbonaras while I'm there, and see how you're making out?"

"It would be very kind if you would," the Major assented eagerly. "Perhaps if you saw this man Malone?"

"No, I guess not," his companion interrupted firmly. "Not at first, anyway. I can't see how you could get together in private. You'll know all that Malone's got to tell you by then, and if it fits in with what I know—which it most probably will—well, there won't be much that I can do to help."

"But if it doesn't?" the Major asked. "In that case, we'll have to look into things a little closer," Becker said cheerfully. "As I say, you'll probably be fixed up well enough without me." He paused for a moment, and then went on: "I think it will be wise if you don't mention that you've seen me at all. Not to Malone, nor even to your daughter or this Mr.—your friend who's come with you. We're both men of the world—you and I—and we know a bit about its shady side. I don't say there is anything phoney about this, but if there is, it's better we should keep the other side from suspecting we know about it—at any rate, for the time. Don't you agree?"

The Major nodded portentously. "Oh, certainly," he assented. "These young people lack discretion, and they probably give the whole show away at once. I shall say nothing about having met you, Mr. Becker, but I'll look forward to seeing you in a couple of days. You must say I think it's devilish good of you to take so much interest in me."

"Not at all! Not at all!" Becker interrupted hurriedly, rising to his feet. "I can't do a thing for you, but if you'll excuse me right now, I must say I think it's devilish good of you to take so much interest in me."

U. S. Army Notes How 5th Column Beat The Dutch

WASHINGTON, June 4—(CP)—Over in the block-long munitions building, whose architecture is early 20th century whitewashed barracks, the United States army boys were torn from their books that venerable saying: "You can't beat the Dutch."

Inserted there is a "Warning to Future Generals": The way those fifth columns work beats the Dutch. Sitting down the reports of the Nazis five-day blitzkrieg of Holland, the army experts have concluded that the fifth column again has proved itself the most valuable weapon developed in modern warfare.

The secret made with which the Nazis over-ran Holland, although the Dutch had been preparing for such an emergency for years, can be summed up in two words: internal combustion.

For example, from the very outset of the German invasion, snipers took a toll of Dutch soldiers from the roofs and windows of buildings even in the well-protected cities of The Hague, Amsterdam and Rotterdam.

When the sixth column, or parachute troops, arrived at one of the main airports near Rotterdam, only two civil policemen were on duty—two who were not even allowed to enter the airport.

Hour after hour, parachute troops were reported landing in localities, strangely, Dutch troops weren't.

There's one thing more, though this occurred in Belgium. U. S. army officers who fought in the First Great War looked over the collapse of Namur, and the apparently ineffective resistance of the forts of Liege and ran back through the ruins of the city.

Mussolini Dragging Italy Into Conflict

By J. F. Sanderson Canadian Press Staff Writer LONDON, June 2—(CP Cable)—Premier Mussolini's personal prejudices and ambitions are being blamed here for dragging Italy to the brink of war on the side of Germany.

Authoritative quarters disclosed that soon after Prime Minister Churchill assumed office he wrote a personal letter to I. Duce. Its contents were not made public, but observers took it for granted that Mr. Churchill stressed this point—that there is no difference between the Allies and Italy which cannot be solved by good-will.

Observers believed he said that there was no point between Italy, Britain and France requiring resort to armed force. In diplomatic quarters it was stated "if the Italians go to war it will be their responsibility. We shall know how to deal with any attack if it comes."

Britain and France, qualified sources said, have done everything possible during the last few months to meet the political and economic aspirations of Italy, but have been thwarted at each approach by Mussolini.

Diplomatic observers see other repercussions of Germany's land successes. The first has been King Carol's replacement Saturday of Grigore Gafencu, the foreign minister, by Ion Giguiru, a pro-Nazi anti-Semite. Removal of Gafencu, who was pro-Allies, is interpreted here as an indication that King Carol is beginning to play safe and is starting the lean toward Germany.

Rumania is not expected to enter the war on the side of Germany, but increased shipments of oil and wheat will be sent to the Reich. Carol has made no step, on the other hand, toward lifting the Anglo-French guarantee of military support in the event of aggression against his country.
