"De Good Lawd Himself looks not at de clocs but first-off, right into de heart!" However it is strange that Judy could find "nothing of interest to write." She was always gifted with a sense that could find much of interest in her work, or in the neighborhood doings. "There's a big grey hen on de nest now," she would come in from her choring to report, "she looks for all de world like a woman I knew over home—just de same look out of her eyes."

October, already a month of variable moods, first days so chilly and showery and today so mild and lovely, put a soft baby-blink above the now winking colorful hills. In this evening's afterglow and presently set a slim crescent moon above it and for company the evening star. Grand-daughter commented "only one star!" as she preceded me up the driveway. We were coming then from feeding the last pair of calves—the two that pasture now in the meadow by the lane—silencing their plaintive wails and setting a sure seal to the last of the choring expected of you for the day. The pup, her teasing and playful shadow, scouted ahead of me. Pard was away. He had gone with the harvesters, accompanying them to the threshing at the other farm this afternoon. He, wise dog that he is, has now a new feather in his cap and is, if possible more respected in our eyes. When toward the end of last week, the weather changed from fair to rainy, we missed him from his usual haunts about the place. James mourned over him and whistled for him in vain. "He's gone," we agreed, to find him at the other farm where the horses had been left on pasture over-night. He was standing guard over the harness and hay-wagons there. "Pard," James now tells him, patting the head that rests on his knee, "you may be a mongrel, but you're one very wise dog!"

Until tomorrow... Diary... Good-night...

who are near your own age and who are getting a little nervous about being left to face life alone. They have gotten to the place where they want to settle down and have a home and a husband, and they will turn listening ear to your lovingkindness. You may even be lucky enough to find some woman who has a mother complex and to whom the three children will be an inducement, instead of a drawback, to marrying you. But your difficulty is one that all widowers with children meet. No matter how attractive a man is himself, nor how glad a girl would be to marry him if he had no incumbrances, she knows the role of the stepmother is a hard one and she hesitates to tackle it.
