My goodness, Annie seems to be letting her attention wander while Nurse O'Shaughnessy is reading to her. But she isn't really that rude. She's just showing you how badly it looks. You've stood close to the nurse, paying close attention to the story.

NURSE was reading a little girl a story, because she had coaxed and coaxed to hear about the boy at the circus.

"But the little girl wasn't listening."

"Are you paying attention?" said her nurse. The little girl came back and Nurse went on to read some more. But the child was humming a tune. She just forgot to be polite.

NURSE was just about to close the book for keeps, when another child came in and asked to be read to. She listened and listened to every word. Which one do you think was the more polite? And which one would get a story next time? You know. The child who paid attention and sat still.

When people do us favors they like to have us notice it. If we act as though we don't care, they won't feel like keeping on.
