With the destruction of the German battleship Bismarck in the most lurid sea drama of this war, Britain's Royal Navy did more than avenge the lost battle cruiser Hood and her people. It altered in Britain's favor the odds in the battle of the Atlantic, upon the outcome of which rests the fate of the British Empire.

At a single stroke a most menacing threat to British commerce in the Atlantic, the life-blood of her war effort, had been removed. With the Bismarck gone and the less effective Nazi battle cruisers Scharnhorst and Gneisenau immobilized at Brest for weeks, there remain only three German capital ships at most that could again jeopardize British convoys in mid-Atlantic.

Moreover, the grieving relatives of the Hood's dead and the Royal Navy may find comfort in the fact that it was the Hood which in her own death agony dealt the Bismarck the blow that ultimately sent her to join her victim. It was, according to German official accounts, a shell wound on her prow, landed by the Hood in a dawn-lighted five minutes of tragedy, that slowed the Bismarck down and prevented her escape in the end.

Available to the Germans to renew the attempt at capital ship raiding remains certainly the Bismarck's sister battleship, the Tirpitz; and presumably two even more powerful and swift craft, the Friederich Der Grosse and the Hindenburg. Both were under construction when the war started and probably are now either ready for sea or close to it. Both also are believed to be 40,000 tonners as compared to the 35,000 ton Bismarck and Tirpitz, the 26,000 ton Scharnhorst and Gneisenau and the two remaining 10,000 ton "pocket battleships," the Admiral Scheer and the Lutzow.

Presumably the 40,000 tonners are faster and more heavily armed and of equal armor thickness at least with the Bismarck class. Neither has yet figured in the war, unless British bombers have hit them during raids on German navy and ship yards.

For the moment, however, it is only the Tirpitz against which the whole British Fleet in the Atlantic need stand guard. The two remaining Nazi pocket battleships are too vulnerable to cruiser or even merchant auxiliary gunfire to be a deadly menace. And a ship, the Bismarck, that would have been of prime value to the Germans in an attempted invasion of England has been wiped out.

GREECE

Her stoic face symbolic of the tragedy that now overshadows the glory of Greece, an aged woman sits beside the ruins of her home in Piraeus, Greek port battered by axis bombers. Beside her is a young boy, possibly her grandson, a hint of the hope that Greece will rise again.
