BRIDEGROOM-TO-BE FORGOT ALTAR DATE

ABERDEEN, Aug 29—A bridegroom-to-be with a bad memory caused a commotion in the Turriff district.

The bride, the guests, and the minister were all waiting at an hotel. A quarter of an hour passed —then half an hour.

The bride was on the point of collapse. She fought down an inclination to go into hysterics and set off on a bicycle to find him.

Then she was given a lift in a motor car.

She searched every likely place including her bridegroom-to-be's home. Finally in desperation, she went to the farm where he was employed.

She found him, hard at work, blissfully unconscious of the trouble he had caused. It was too late for the ceremony.

APPLE POLLINATION STUDIES

App'e Pollination Studies in the Annapolis Valley, Nova Scotia, under the direction of W. H. Brittain, (Bulletin No. 162, Dominion Department of Agriculture), just off the press represents the most comprehensive study of apple pollination so far attempted. In addition to a popular summary the bulletin consists of five main sections: (1) Introduction, discussing the general features of the apple industry in Nova Scot'a having a particular bearing on the problem, together with a brief resume of factors other than pollination affecting fruit production; (2) Pollination and fruitfulness in apples in which the pollination problem in its various phases is outlined; (3) Experimental studies in apple pollination in which the exhaustive experiments undertaken in all phases of the problem are explained and the results concisely summarized; (4) Field studies in insect pollinators, in which the role of wild insect pollinators is explained and the problems connected with the utilization of hive bees are elucidated; (5) Studies in bee poisoning, in which the results of experimental work undertaken to determine the cause and prevention of poisoning among bees due to spraying and dusting practice is fully set forth.

Though the work deals with experiments undertaken in Nova Scotia, an attempt has been made to attack the problem from a fundamental standpoint so that the results obtained are, to a large extent applicable wherever apples are grown. It is shown that a pollination problem rrises, (1) when self-unfruitful varieties, which includes practically all commercial sorts, are planted in solid blocks; (2) when cross-unfruitful varieties are planted together and (3) when the population of pollination insects is inadequate to effect pollination. The results of insufficient pollination. An important point that is clearly brought out in the studies is that apple varieties may be sharply divided into two groups, namely, good pollinizers and poor pollinizers. The first of these are suitable for pollination of others blossoming at the same time, the second are of inferior value or worthless for all other varieties. In the light of the foregoing the proper planting of orchards to secure adequate pollination is discussed and illustrated.

The work of wild and hive bees in pollinating orchards is fully discussed. The former were found to be more widely distributed than formerly disposed. The necessity of supplying hive bees to insure pollination in certain circumstances is explained and the proper method of distribution and placing is discussed. A full discussion of the factors resulting in bee poisoning is included, with methods of avoiding or minimizing such damage. The bulletin concludes with a list of literature cited and an excellent index.

While the bulletin is a technical one, a popular summary placed in the front sets forth in brief form the practical results of the investigation and this together with the charts, diagrams and figures with which it is profusely illustrated, will enable it to be used by the practical grower.

Princess Gold Pretties of Borneo, Rajah's Daughter

When "Princess Gold Pretties" knelt beside the Earl of Inchcape at the altar of historic St. George's church in Hanover Square, London, Dyak head-hunters on the other side of the world threaded their way through the jungle paths of Borneo all unknowing.

But is was the daughter of their sovereign (they knew her as "Princess Gold Pretties") who was being married, the daughter of Sir Charles Vyner Brooke, the white Rajah of Sarawak.

And though the daughter of the third Rajah of Sarawak, "Lord and Taker of Life," was marrying the second Earl of Inchcape, World War soldier and shipping magnate, the wedding ceremony was one of the quietest and simplest of 1933's June ceremonies. There weren't even any bridesmaids. Yet for all the simplicity of the ceremony, here was the uniting of two families each with so bizarre a career that if you read it in fiction you would say it was just that.

Real Adventure

Back in 1840, the grandfather of the bride was a young man, just discharged from the Indian army, and unwilling to settle down to a quiet life in England. The East had gotten into James Brook's blood. So he took all the money he could scrape to gether and chartered a ship. He filled it equally with adventurous friends and plenty of arms. Then he sailed for Borneo, seeking adventure. He found it.

The Sultan of Brunel, to whom Sarawak belonged, was in the midst of an unsuccessful struggle with pirates who were terrorizing his entire domain. Brooke and his friends offered their services as soldiers of fortune. They cleaned out the pirates, and as a reward the grateful sultan made Brooke a rajah, with Sarawak as the domain over which he was to have absolute rule.

James Brook became the white rajah, and third in line from him the father of the present bride now rules Sarawak.

Cannibalism Still Found

Once Sarawak's capital, Kuching, was seized by Chinese pirates and only recaptured after a bloody battle. But the constant battle of the white rajahs has been against the ignorance and barbarism of their own 500,000 subjects spread through a large jungled area. Tigers are as common as alley-cats, and the head-hunting Dyaks and other Malay subjects are cannibalistic.

Brooke was knighted, his nephew succeeded him, and then his son, the present rajah, returning from Cambridge, led expeditions against the head hunters. He married the Hon. Sylvia Brett, daughter of Lord Esher, who became thus Ranee of Sarawak.

It is their daughter, Leonora Brooke, who has married the Earl of Inchcape. She was reared in the jungle capital where 30-foot snakes and huge poisonous insects abound, and even the royal palace rooms must be kept almost bare so crawling danger may be quickly seen. Yet it is a country into which the enlightened rule of the white rajahs is gradually bringing civilization and good government.

Romantic Rise

The family of the bridegroom is little less romantic. His father was a poor Scots boy named Mackay, who at the age of 14 was working long hours at 50 cents a week in a shipping office. He wound up a multi-millionaire shipping magnate and Earl of Inchcape, with a fortune so great that the inheritance taxes alone were more than $5,000,000. The present earl came into the title in 1929. He is now 45, father of three sons, and divorced two years ago from the former Joan Moriarty. He served during the World War with the Twelfth Lancers and the machine gun corps.

His sister, the Hon. Elsie Mackay, is dead. But in the family lineage, this is written: "Lost in airplane attempting Atlantic flight, East-West, March 13, 1928." It was she who started out with Captain Bert Hinchcliffe five years ago to cross the Atlantic, and who was never heard from again. Even the feminine Mackays were valiant.

It was on one of her numerous trips to England that the rajah's daughter met the earl. She had been reported engaged to Max Ausnit, Rumanian millionaire. But that was broken off when the earl began his courting. And a 22-year old girl came from the jungles of Borneo and married a dignified earl.

The wedding month of 1933, or any other June for all that, can produce no more glamorous romance.

Bagpipes At Dunvegan

(T. B. R. In the Winnipeg Free Press)

On August 3 the London Times printed a descriptive report of the unveiling of the Memorial Cairn at Dunvegan, Skye, to the MacCrimmons, a family which has won celebrity in the annals of Scotland by its dexterity with the bagpipes.

The reporter who did the job for the Times was suitably under the influence of the Skye atmosphere when he hammered out his account of the performance, as the following descriptive passage indicates:

"It was a grey misty morning when Macleod left his castle at Dunvegan and sailed across the loch to Borreraig, where the memorial cairn stands. The greatest pipers of the day had come to take part in the ceremony, and during the sail across the dark loch the strains of the pipers carried far across the sea and land. The chief and the pipers landed at Borreraig and climbed the hill where the cairn stands in view of the blue Cuillin and the bens of Harris."

The blue Cuillin and the bens of Harris! That does it quite successfully: picks you up and sets you on the back of fancy's eagle, who spreads his wings and soars across the world to Skye, and the Isles, and the "West Coast" while your heart beats twice. Our dear granitic sentimental homeland.

The Times man continues to pour it out. He relates an old story about the MacCrimmon who was King of the pipers kissing the unfortunate hand of Charles II. at Stirling in 1651, and immediately composing then and there the "classical pibroch" called "I got a kiss of the King's hand.' Charles, with Oliver hunting him, slipped away from Stirling to his forlorn nine years' exile in Europe, but the MacCrimmon's skirl went echoing over the bens and lochs, and has done so ever since.

* * *

We do not make any pretence about bagpipe music. Our origins are Lowland. Such pipe music as we have heard has mostly been played indoors. We agree it has great "arousing" possibilities. One of our early friends won championships for piping, and has spent whole evenings playing the chanter to us. But, there you are. Birth north of the Highland line is essential for an unforced sympathy with the bagpipes. Our friend was a Coll man, and learned his music from the screaming seeabirds and the Atlantic waves as they wailed in the caverns of Coll or droned on its summer sands. We were raised amid asphalt surroundings and the symphonies of street cars and factory whistles, and this destroyed our ear for pipe music. But in the literary sense, as objects of romance, dreams, and legends, our admiration and feeling for the music of the Gael is second to nobody's; and that includes, of course, the instrument itself.

One of our earliest recollections is of the pipers who played for pennies in the Glasgow streets. They were badly run-down fellows, socially, and often so full of whiskey they couldn't walk straight. They were held up to our young eyes as examples of what drink could do to a man, and "drunk as a piper" was the last frontier of alcoholic possibility. But those pipers were a nice spot of color on the causeys.

They wore the kilt, and moth-eaten Balmoral or Glengarry caps; sporrans draped their scandalous middles; their stockings were tartan too, with a broken-cased old skean-dhu stuck in them. Frequently they couldn't raise a Highland coat, and had to top their kilts with some wretched tweed jacket; but though they were in the very lees of Fortune's runnel those gangrel pipers had an air, and to see one of them strutting back and forth, his fiery face puffed up behind the chanter, blowing out strathspeys and marches, while his woman, poor soul, tried to collect an odd penny from the passerby, had something very heroic and touching about it.

This is why the Lowland Scot unquestioningly accepts the Highlander's barbaric pipe as the national instrument. Not for its musical charm. Heaven save us, but as a heroic symbol. All the past of Scotland seems to rise again in gallant style at the incantation of the pipes. There was surely a piper at Bannockburn. It was the pipers who heartened Bonnie Charlie's regiments on their crazy foray into England, and who sounded the wild laments in every glen in the Highlands after Culloden. The pipes were played on the Eve of Waterloo, as Lord Byron describes in his striking verse. Piper Findlater, with his legs shot through, skirled up the Cock o' the North while the Gordons stormed the heights of Dargai in the Indian hills, a long cast from dewy Dunvegan of the mists. And today you can find memorial cairns of later date than that all over the Scottish countrysides, both north and south of Stirling, for Highland lads and Lowland lads who went into battle together to the strain of the pipes.

The bagpipe, we seem to remember, was once declared during the troubled times of the Eighteenth Century to be a weapon of war, and the London Government made attempts to abolish both the pipes and the kilt. With complete unsuccess. North and South Scotland grew together in understanding and interests, and the type-figure which emerged as the distinctive Scottish symbol was the kilted Highlander, blowing for preference into his famous pipe. The clans had triumphed. It was Rob, and not douce law-abiding Bailie who took the world's fancy, and Scotland's too. The shiftless, unreliable, and dangerous "romantics" came out on top again, as they have always done, in the affection of posterity.

And what do we find now? Britain's most noted newspaper giving picturesque reports of ceremonial unveilings at Dunvegan to the memory of a family of bagpipers; and not a Scot the world over, come he from Forth, or Tweed or Spey, or Clyde, but will read of it with interest. The savage old prohibitions against the Highlanders have long ago been composed by the ministrations of time. Away north of Stirling, on a jagged peak of the Grampians high above the green shoulders of the Ochils you might imagine a tremendous figure in kilts, with swelling cheeks, filling all Scotland with a weird, shrill, astonishing, arousing music. He would be the national genius of the country and of the race; playing the bagpipes. MacCrimmon's progeny, still going strong
