NOT GOOD ENOUGH
During the past week, Haligonians have seen one tavern in operation. What they have seen is not good.

In the conduct of this first tavern the system generally is on trial. It will be sincerely hoped that the performance of the past week is not typical of what is to come.

The Halifax Herald believes that the basic mistake was to allow one tavern to open for business in a city of approximately 100,000 people — and a seaport city at that.

From the standpoint of the Tavern Licensing Board which is responsible not only for licensing taverns, but for regulating their operation, it was a serious mistake because the pressure obviously is too great for one tavern to meet.

From the standpoint of many of those favoring the tavern system it was most unwise because it has led to demonstrate the moderate conduct which advocates had promised.

From the standpoint of citizens of Halifax who have business in the area it has been one of the most objectionable features incorporated into the life of this city for many years.

Surely this condition is not in accord with the intentions of those who voted "yes" for taverns in this city.

The adoption of the tavern system brings special responsibilities. There is a responsibility first of all upon the licensing authority to see that its own regulations are adequate to insure a maximum of respectability and that taverns are operated in a manner satisfactory not only to those who frequent them, but to the general public as well.

There is a heavy responsibility also upon any one holding a tavern license. That privilege carries with it the obligation to operate such tavern with a maximum of efficiency.

True, this is the first and for the moment the only tavern in the city. That situation in itself presents obvious difficulties, but that is all the more reason for special effort to live up to the promised standard.

The tavern has had one week in which to experiment with methods of operation. The Tavern Licensing Board has had a week in which to determine weaknesses in its machinery for control. There are striking lessons for both in the week's experience.

It now remains for them to profit by these lessons so that next week and in the weeks to come taverns will operate in a manner commensurate with the best that was promised for them. — The Halifax Herald, Oct. 4, 1948.

ANOTHER TAVERN TALE

Death struck one man down and narrowly missed another, in Los Angeles recently, when a car zig-zagging at high speed through a tunnel near the downtown business district, struck two pedestrians and crashed into a truck near the exit. The police described the driver as being "in a drunken condition."

Thought was the bathroom door, stepping in only too late to find he had opened the door of the stallway and tumbled down to the bottom where he was found by his wife. Mr. O'Brien is a brother of John T. O'Brien and left Bristol forty-five years ago. He is an inspector on the Boston Elevated Railway for many years and visited his old home here last summer.

THE LEGITIMATE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IS A GREATER MENACE THAN THE BOOTLEGGERS!
1. In "dry territory" men may seek liquor; in "wet territory" liquor seeks them.
2. In "dry territory" only those who are accustomed to drinking liquor ever think about it; in "wet territory" everyone is constantly being reminded of it.
3. While at times the illicit traffic flourishes slyly, the legal liquor traffic flourishes openly and has a greater chance to grow.
4. The bootlegger was no hypocrite. He never boasted of what a good citizen he was nor of the bonds he bought nor of his contributions to charities. He was a detrimental influence in the community, but everybody knew it.
5. The money received from liquor taxes is not commensurate with the loss of health of the citizenry, the loss of man hours in industry, nor the loss of life of those who become the victims of inebriates or partially drunken drivers.
6. Those who visited the bootlegger were usually at least partially aware of the risk they are taking; those who drink supposedly "good liquor" may really believe there is such a commodity.
7. The bootlegger, because of the fear of being found out, assumed a partial responsibility for his customer; the legitimate liquor dealer, except in rare instances, assumes none whatsoever, except in the case of minors. — Florence Marshall Stelwagon.

My family loves that Boston flavor
Tender beans cooked to scrumptious perfection in a spicy tomato sauce — just the right amount of pork for that "Boston Brown" flavor — that's Aylmer. Your family, too, deserves Aylmer quality.
