CLASS WORK AT THE SHORT COURSE

(Continued.) Breeders used to be of the opinion that if they produced something different from other breeders they would get better profits. Today the spirit of cooperation has been developed into societies for the production of various farm products and the movement now is to induce cooperative breeding of live stock as a means of demanding the recognition of the breeders' work. It is reasonable to expect that a uniform product is procured, it will cause less expense in shipping and less expense in procuring, a buyer can pay more and reap greater profits for the produce if he gets the same within a confined district. Examples may be pointed out where the live stock breeders are gaining profits from such methods of procedure, and our products on the island are of such a nature that community breeders will fill one of our greatest needs. The live stock associations that were started here last year are proving themselves an adequate means of providing not only improved live stock raising but a valuable means for the promotion of community breeding, and as they develop they will undoubtedly show greater merit in this respect.
