BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

SALLY SLY'S BOLDNESS

The ones you think are merely sly
Surprising boldness often try.
—Old Mother Nature

Skimmer the Swallow has spread the news through the Old Orchard that Sally Sly the Cowbird had been seen with several of her admirers over in the Old Pasture. It wasn't exactly bad news. On the other hand it certainly wasn't good news.

"She may not come over here at all," said Kitty the Catbird. "She will. She will the first time she has a chance. We mustn't give her a chance to get in here without being seen. Whoever sees her should give the alarm at once, not wait until she has done something a mischief by laying an egg in with theirs," declared Welcome Robin.

"I'm glad some of us have nothing to worry about if she does come," said Winsome Bluebird. "Meaning what?" asked Kitty the Catbird.

"She can't get in our house if she tries. The doorway isn't big enough. I can barely get through it myself and she's a little bigger than me. So she never will impose on us by leaving an egg in our nest," replied Winsome.

"And our doorway is smaller than yours, so we have nothing of that kind to worry about," twittered Mrs. Skimmer happily. "Dee, dee, dee! Our doorway is still smaller," cried Tommy Tit.

"And Jenny Wren's is just as small," he added. "No open nest in the Old Orchard is safe from her, not even mine hanging from the tip of a limb way up high in a tall tree," said Goldie the Oriole.

"There is one nest you have forgotten, one she won't dare go near," said Welcome Robin. "Whose?" demanded Goldie. "Scraper the Kingbird's," replied Welcome Robin and all the listeners agreed with him.

"It is us smaller folks, like Mrs. Chippy and myself, the Viero cousins, and others near our size, who have greatest cause for worry," said Chippy the Chipping Sparrow. "This was quite true. Sally Sly prefers that her babies shall be in nests where their foster brothers and sisters will be smaller than they are. Thus Sally Sly's babies will be stronger because bigger, and will be able to get more food and grow faster than the others."

Now while this gossiping was going on Sally Sly had sneaked near enough under cover to overhear what was said. She was even then looking for a nest in which to leave an egg. She had found the nest of Sunshine the Yellow Warbler, but it was not yet finished. She was smart enough to know that if she left an egg in it now that nest never would be finished. Those Warblers would leave it and build another nest elsewhere. She must find a nest with eggs in it, a nest that wouldn't be deserted just because an egg of hers had been added to the others.

Quite by chance she discovered the nest of Scraper the Kingbird. She knew whose nest it was because Mrs. Scraper was perched near it. That meant that she hadn't yet begun sitting on her eggs if there were eggs in that nest they were freshly laid, and that was what Sally Sly wanted. But she wanted no trouble with the Scrappers, so she would look for some other nest, a nest of smaller folk who could make her no trouble if she was discovered.

And then Mrs. Blacky the Crow flew over the Old Orchard on her way home to the Green Forest. She was flying lower than was wise. Screaming angrily Scraper and Mrs. Scraper flew up to meet her, and all the other birds followed.

It was Sally Sly's chance and she took advantage of it. She would have a look in that nest of the Kingbird's. She did. There were three eggs in it. She slipped into the nest. When she silently slipped away a couple of minutes later there was four eggs in the nest. She hurried back to the Old Pasture. She had boldly left an egg where no one thought she would dare leave one.

The next story: "The Scandal Grows".

U. S. ACTED QUICKLY

After the Battle of Britain in 1940, when the R. A. F. defeated the German Luftwaffe, the United States rushed the reserve weapons of the American Army to Britain.

She was even then looking for a nest in which to leave an egg
