The third part making the impression left by each lesson a lasting one, many appear unnecessary because of a pupil's interest in the subject and studies it.

For this reason the teacher should see that the child has sufficient knowledge on the subject to warrant a vivid mental picture. He may also help the pupil to form the picture by associating with each event or person of note some peculiarity as regards looks or manner.

Another method of leaving an indelible impression on the pupils' mind is by the aid of pictures. By this means the pupil cannot make a mistake in forming a mental picture after seeing the real picture.

These three divisions in the method of teaching does not, by any means necessitate dividing the lesson into three parts. If the teacher has a good method of teaching and knows his work thoroughly before attempting to discuss it with the class, then the interest will accompany the presenting of the lesson and the impression left will be a natural consequence.

Piccadilly 'Ghost'

(By Dominion News Service)

LONDON, June 13.—Weird "manifestations" were seen and heard by a press representative who spent hours between midnight and dawn in a reputedly haunted house in Upper John-street, near Piccadilly-circus, waiting for a spook who is said to haunt the building.

The building, 200 years old, was formerly a priest's house and is said to have been built on the site of an ancient burial ground. It is now occupied by the Faculty of Arts, whose exhibition of pictures is shown in part of it. Miss Co-stance Wright, assistant to the secretary, is convinced of the "ghost's" existence.

The secretary's room used to be a chapel. There is no access to the cellars except by tearing up the flagstone floor of the lower room, which has not been done for fifty years. There is also a secret room, the situation of which is unknown to any one.

Atmosphere like that of a crypt strikes one on entering the basement room, formerly a kitchen, now an exhibition gallery. At one end is the bricked-up entrance to a tunnel which used to lead to Warwick street.

The press representative, who awaited the "ghost" in this room, heard soon after midnight slight irregular tappings, which seemed to come from below. Miss Wright had declared that the ghost's appearance was always heralded by these sounds.

The only unusual happening that followed the tapping, however, was the appearance of a pallid ray of light, which stretched the whole length of the stairs. The sounds and the light were repeated at frequent intervals, and finally the atmosphere of the room became so "crowded" that it was impossible to stay in it. No person could remain seated alone in the building ten minutes without becoming sensible of the supernatural element. Escape from it was sheer physical relief.

During his vigil the representative, made uneasy by the tapping sounds, went to the door of the room to see if it was causing the noise. He opened it, and as he did so he received the shock of his life. The nude body of a woman confronted him.

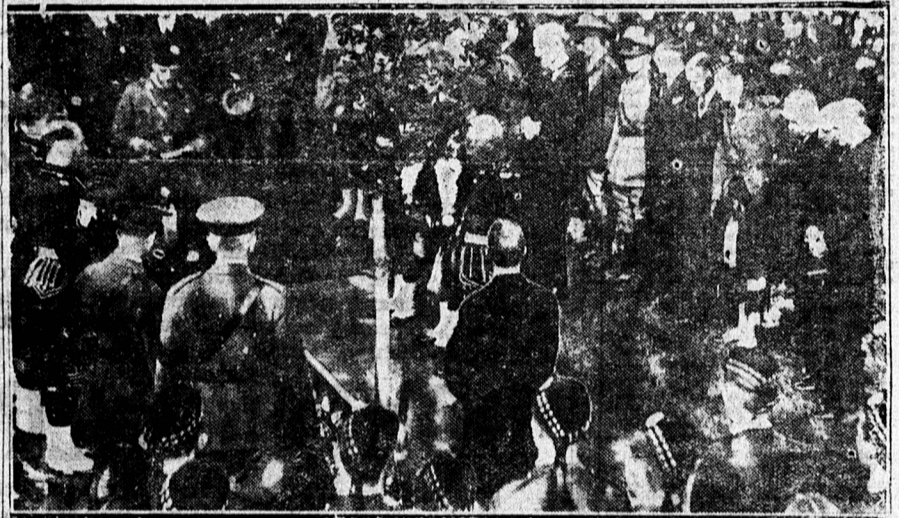

It took him fully two horror-stricken minutes to realize that what he was looking at was not nature nor the supernatural, but simply a painting.

Canadian history is full of romance and vividness. One of the most striking of its contributions to the movement of British loyal United States at the close of the American Revolution was the American Revolution. Many descendants of these loyal pioneers will participate. It was in September, 1783, that five ships carrying Loyalists sailed from New York via the St. Lawrence River, to settle in the Quinte district. Wintering at Sorel, they arrived at their destination in the following summer. They made homes for themselves in the virgin forests, and laid the foundation for the busy towns and cities and the prosperous agricultural areas of today.

Otter of Toronto, a vice-president; below him Sir Hugh John Macdonald, K. C., of Winnipeg, also a vice-president. Sir Hugh is a son of the late Sr John A. Macdonald, Canada's first Confederation Premier, whose early home in the Bay of Quinte district is also shown.
