CHAPTER IV

"Shut up, Kitty. This is poppycock, sheer, utter and complete. We'll make our down payment on what capital we can scrape and borrow on Sierra's prospects. Meanwhile, if Sierra's old man gets benign as his wedding day approaches, we'll be duly grateful, if not unduly surprised."

"Something tells me," observed Miss Baldwin, "that it is as good as settled that Twenty-one East is to be henceforth the address of three — of three —"

"Reluctant spinsters," interposed the Charlottenburg. "Some more of that marmalade, please!"

Less than half a year after the marriage of John Baldwin to Leonore Boardman, shirred white silk shades, always fully drawn, appeared in every front window of the conspicuously narrow, three storied Twenty-one East. It was a strong house, boasting substantial mortgage terms negotiated by Kitty and the Charlottenburg, terms which, when John Baldwin heard them, he declared to be as astute a deal as he would have turned himself. And now here they were, the three of them, faced with the reality of their first night of occupancy of Twenty-one East.

Gone, as if Sierra had dropped a wrap from her shoulders, were the years of brown-plus living, of a motherless and rudderless girl in a brownstone mansuism, over which lay the cracked laughter of Mamie Baldwin who had been hauled from it during the years Sierra was in pinafores.

Here they were, newly established. Three women in a tiny but dazzling nucleus of a house already filled with the personalities of two with whom Sierra intended to match up her own design of existence.

Bachelor girls! The newly coined phrase of the newly coined century rang like a coin on a counter.

"I wonder, Sierra," remarked Kitty, her mauve eyes watching every move of the new staff-of-one servant she had installed, "if that parent of yours, who is now sharing board and bed with Leonore—"

"I am afraid, dear, that discussion is about milked dry of its alleged comic implications."

"What Mullane, who is utterly lacking in my well-known forthrightness, is about to remark, Sierra, is that she has spent three times as much as our budget permits, in rigging us up here and her papa's financial foresight to direct our investments, if we are to live in the style to which we are not accustomed."

"In other words—"

"No, in the same crude words, our respective, if not too respectable incomes, derived from combined soldier-of-fortune messing in this, and that, add up to deficit."

"If only I had been clever enough to become your stepmother, Sierra. Then there wouldn't be the ridiculous and periodic necessity of approaching the oracle of your father for an investment tip that will enable the two aged harrieds with whom you have chosen to consort, to live less visibly beyond their means."

"Father has an old-fashioned dislike for handling women's investments. It's only because of the enchantment of the Charlottenburg, seems to cast over him that he was prevailed upon to gamble for you last time. He hates it!"

"A tip from your father isn't a gamble. It's an investment."

"Besides, we're good losers."

"Be honest with yourself, Kit. You know well and good that we know that John Baldwin isn't going to let us lose—that's why he hates to do business with women."

"I'm not well-born like you, Charlottenburg. I come from a shabby family where honesty with one's self or others isn't recklessly without dropping a tear among the heather. —"

"But in a new country there are better opportunities for young folk; at least that's what Old Wied used to say," interrupted Hector.

"Ye have spoken a great truth, laddie. While there's no land quite so bonnie as Scotland, it's an auld country with a' the good land taken up long syne, so that rising generations find themselves more or less at a disadvantage."

"But what 'o' my flocks and the life I've grown to love so dearly? And how would I come by the money to take such a long journey—"

"If it's no more than a matter o' money, laddie, that would be holding ye back, do not fret ye, for I've forty pounds resting in the bank this very minute, that I'd draw out and put into your poke as quick as ye could say cock robin. My humble cottage and the few acres o' land that goes with it will be yours at my death. But I want to help ye while I'm living, laddie. So ye can have that forty pounds now. It's not much, to be sure; but a young healthy chap like ye will be able to get along handsomely on that amount o' ready cash. Just think over, Hector, me lad. The chance in a lifetime I call it."

and I could lay hands on, counting poor Mother's tiny legacy and my share in a bank stock I own jointly with Florence."

"Good. Your father may quadruple our total or do anything he sees fit. Copper can do wonderful things."

"It hasn't for Father in recent years."

"Perhaps his greatest future does lie behind him. But his record for turning copper to gold should still hold when it comes to turning thirteen or fourteen thousand into sufficient to make his daughter's living mates fit companions for her."

"Remember, Sierra mia, he once did turn our two thousand into twenty."

"Most of which Kitty and I have proceeded to sink in Twenty-one East, in jewelry making, in indulgent British layrights, in crackpot inventions, dance teams, colored fire, colored sugar —"

"You are a pair of naughty and amazing women. I adore you. I adore you as much as I detest going to my father and asking him to —"

"Subsidize our lunacy —"

"— and asking him to give us a tip that will enable three deserving spinsters to make Twenty-one East, what it already is to me, the most exciting house in the world."

uncle had ceased talking. Suddenly he awoke from his reveries and, turning piercing black eyes full upon Sandy, said: "Can't ye remember any more o' what the Earl said? For a moment I clean forgot I was in this world. Excuse me, uncle."

"I've told ye the main things, laddie; but the Earl also spoke about that wonderful estate o' his, o' how fertile the ground was. Why, the wheat and corn came right up to a man's shoulders, and the potatoes was the best he'd ever seen anywhere. He said there was bonnie forests stocked with plenty o' wild animals, that every river and stream swarmed with many kinds o' fishes, and—oh, yes—there are real Indians there that live in funny little wigwams."

"Now, that's about all there was into that letter, laddie, excepting that he mentioned a young healthy fellow like ye be ought to fare off right smart after being in the country a few years."

"Now, what think ye o' the offer, laddie? Why, if 'tweren't for the weight o' years upon these old shoulders o' mine, I'd sell out this very day and join Selkirk and the rest o' them, though, mind ye, I wouldn't leave auld Scotland."
