HOW THEY FACED THE CRISIS.

(From Life).

"Gentlemen, we must retrench." The president of the great railroad faced the board of directors. Every face there blanched at the thought. "Yes," he continued, "something must be done to maintain our reputation for integrity and for that sound and conservative business policy which has been one of our distinguishing traits. For I regret to say, the Interstate Commerce Commission does not understand or appreciate our condition. The cost of living has increased so much, that, alas! I fear disaster, in view of the fact that we are not permitted to raise our rates. Gentlemen, something must be done."

All eyes were turned to the speaker. At last, with a voice that trembled with emotion, one of the directors leaned forward: "What can you suggest?" he whispered hoarsely. "I fear the worst. We must cut our dividend."

A deathly silence ensued. It was felt that the fate of several steam yachts was in the balance. Every man there instantly realized what it would mean. "Can nothing else be done?" "Nothing."

Another director leaned forward. "Gentlemen," he whispered, "let us defer this until, say, day after tomorrow. This will give us time to sell out our holdings at the present prices and buy them back very much lower after this dreadful news has passed out."

One by one they shook his head.
