MAY SEYMOUR FOOT LOOSE
by BEATRICE BURTON ONE.

MAY SEYMOUR, whose husband killed himself because of her love affairs with JIM CAR-EWE, returns home after a year's absence. She disposes of her inherited property, and with $8000 in her handbag, sets out to find and marry a man with money.
At Atlantic City she meets a divorcee, CARLOTTA FROKLI-
ING, and Carlotta's friends, HERBERT WATERBURY and DAN SPRAGUE. Both men pay suit to May, to the distress of Carlotta who has been in love with Dan for several years.
When he proposes, May refuses him, having made up her mind that Waterbury is the millionaire husband she has been looking for.
Carlotta asks May to spend the winter in the California hills. May accepts on condition that Carlotta permit her to pay her share of the expenses.
Then she changes her plans

An hour later the $12,000 was in Herbert Waterbury's hands.
without money, all this perfection of food and service would be impossible!
May sighed luxuriously and blinked sleepily at the sight as she bit into her third roll. "Oh, but I'm happy..." she thought.
But was she? Was she, really? The thought of Herbert's anger with her last night was more or less disturbing. It would be terrible now if he didn't marry her... just because of a harmless flirtation with a boy like Jack Darnley!
"When my money from the house comes I'll turn it over to him to invest. That's soothe his injured feelings," she decided.
She went on thinking about Herbert, as she lazily touched a match to a cigarette, and leaned back in her chair.
"It would be nice if I loved him," she said to herself. "But I guess it just isn't in me to fall in love with any man..."
At that moment her eyes fell on the thick, square envelope that the bellboy had slipped under her door an hour before.
"Goodnight, Nurse," thought May. A little thrill of horror passed through her.
"What if it should be a note from Herbert telling her that perhaps it would be better for them to end their engagement!
... Or suppose it should be a farewell message from young Jack Darnley, telling her that he was going to shoot himself!... It would be just like that wild boy to do it, too! What a fool she had been to let him fall in love with her..."
May's breath came in brightened gasps as she trailed her silk negligee across the room to pick up the letter. Then she breathed a long sigh of relief as she saw that it bore a Montreal postmark.
"Mrs. May Lucas Seymour, care of the large, unmistakable handwriting of Ulysses X. Forgan. The very sight of it was warmly comforting to her.
It brought back, once more, the sound of his deep, low voice, and the sight of his kindly face with the clear brown eyes that seemed to look through and through you...
To read the letter, itself, was like greeting an old friend; and yet it was very businesslike in tone. Folded within it was a New York draft for $12,000!
Without an instant's hesitation, May swept to the telephone and called Herbert's room.
"Good morning, merry sunshine!" she said with forced gaiety. "This is May speaking."
His voice greeted her coldly. "He is jealous!" she thought. "I had my brains I'd make him marry me today, before he changes

THE STORY
A little before 9 o'clock the next morning a bellboy brought a thick, special delivery letter to the door of May Seymour's sitting-room. There was no answer to his repeated knock, for May did not hear him—she was singing at the top of her voice as she splashed in her bath. So he slipped the letter under the door and went away.
May loved music, and she adored the sound of her own silvery soprano voice.
"Depuis le jour..." she trilled, after the yearning manner of Mary Garden.
But as she sang that loveletter of all love songs, she was not thinking of any man's love, but of money! Of the things that she would through his. "But I think I'd like to run up to Pittsfield to see my little daughter for a day or two. I think I ought to tell her she's going to have a new mother."

May dropped. "What if she doesn't like the idea of having a step-mother?" she asked. "What will you do, then?"
"Marry you just the same," Herbert replied. "Marry you just the same, my girl!" But there was a faintness in his voice.
A feeling like a cold hand gripping her heart, entered May's breast. "I wish I had that money of mine back again!" she thought uneasily. "After all, it's my whole fortune..."
That afternoon at five she met Herbert in the restaurant for tea. She had put on her new gray suit, and had pinned a bouquet of orchids to her breast.
"Queer thing—that he's never thought to send me a single flower since he asked me to marry him," she thought to herself. "And he's never mentioned getting me an engagement ring, either!"
Probably the thought had not occurred to him, she decided. So she slipped off her black pearl ring and laid it down on the tablecloth. "Let's get married today!" she was wearing her wedding ring, she said suddenly. "After all, what won't I do for you?" she asked, smiling into his eyes. "Shall a sudden outburst of frankness, sense is there in waiting around for me to be glad to see it on my hand?" she asked. "We love each other—don't you?"
Without answering, Waterbury pulled out his watch and looked at it. Her voice died away and she vehemently, slipping her arm. "Half past five," he mused, stared across the restaurant with

For All Readers of THE CHARLOTTETOWN GUARDIAN
To keep up with the times and supply the demands of all progressive readers, the publishers found it necessary to compile an entirely new dictionary with an enlarged vocabulary and with many special features never before incorporated in a similar volume.
