Austerity Hasn't Taken The Edge Off Humor In Britain

By RUSSELL LANDSTROM LONDON, Jan. 10 — (AP) — Is Britain so austere that there is no time for humor?

Not a bit of it. John Bull may be a bit weary from his flight to survive but he remains plenty in 1949 when humor is a commodity. Comedy colored even great royal occasions. For example, Oxford prepared a big parade to celebrate the wedding anniversary of the King and Queen, then had to call it off because someone poured hot coffee into the champagne.

A London girl reporter sent to Paris on short notice to cover last month's visit by Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip, went to the opera in a pink and black nightgown, because she had no gown. Nobody knew the difference—he was as much admired the royal couple.

The Royal Navy's best joke was on Vice-Admiral Sir John Edgell who cut short a dinner speech. Dismayed, he fumbled through his notes and exclaimed: "By my word, I have brought the shopping list my wife gave me this morning."

Another orator, Lord Mancroft, trotted into a Conservative Party rally and announced: "I won't be able to speak. My house is on fire."

What the queuers say took some of the cause off queuing. There was the customer who, having finally got to the head of the line, asked her butcher: "Two nice whole steaks, and please could I have the head, I want the cat?"

And if any proof is needed that Britons go short—A London woman awoke bleating from the mouth—she had been dreaming of good pre-war meals and bit her tongue.

Housing? One suburbanite built a summer shack in a big tree. A twicepham man asked that the taxes on his house be cut because it was full of ghosts. The Essex County Council authorized taxi fares for stranded tramps as they could ride in ease to hospitals.

Britain's new centralized medical service prompted a Tunbridge Wells specialist to take down his shingle, with the name on it, and substitute this: "Dr. 2108." That's the number the Ministry of Health gave him. At Lewis, a woman bit her dog three times in court to prove the dog was amiable. A Windsor woman was sentenced to six months for trying to steal money to pay a fine for stealing.
