She's gone away. The house is still. The bird sits silent on her perch. It seems to me as though I were a prisoner in an empty church. How lonesome now the hours are. With no one here to call my name! But, say, old man, come up tonight I'll organize a little game.

Married Quarters

By DAVID WYLLIE

Continued

"He is busy, but I admit he has been careless she said bravely. But it resolves itself into this, Lady Augusta. We needn't beat about the bush or waste words, Poppy is desperately unhappy, discontented, a prey to a thousand regrets. She has given up watching the post for a letter from home, but I have come here today to tell you this is the only thing that will save her."

An extraordinary change made itself visible all over Lady Augusta's proud features. They began to work, and her hands interlaced themselves nervously. "I can scarcely credit what you tell me, Miss Bradford, Poppy has been foolish and has wrecked her life and prospects."

"Pardon me, no," said Naomi spiritedly. "She has married one of the best fellows in the world, only she has not accepted some inevitable things yet."

"How could she? The impossible can't and doesn't happen," snapped Lady Augusta. "Do you mean to tell me that Poppy is engaged in a life affair with Reggie Vandelaar, the man who has loved her so long and faithfully, and whom she ought to have married instead of treating him shamefully?"

Naomi heard a different version from Poppy, but did not bring it forward. All she was concerned with was the gaining of her point, and she felt that she was making headway.

"Don't let us quibble over these trifles, Lady Augusta," she said sadly. "I ask you to believe that unless I had been very anxious about Poppy, besides loving her dearly, I should not have placed myself in this position to-day. You are her mother, she needs you desperately—that is all I will say. Please come, and come soon."

"Does Poppy know you have come?" Naomi shook a slightly weary head. "My dear Lady Augusta, I went out had tea with Poppy, and walked back to Markyate, six miles in all—on the way back pondering on how I could save the child. I could only think of you. She is homesick and heartick. Probably if she saw you and if you brought her back with you—in a little while—"

"Impossible! Her name is not mentioned in the house." "Could I then see her father?" inquired Naomi with the most innocent air in the world. "He would do, though this is a woman's business."

Something that was a cross between smile and a spasm twisted Lady Augusta's features. "Tell me about yourself, Miss Bradford. You live in Markyate?"

"Yes, I keep an antique and Berlin-wool shop there, and my niece, Mary Bishop, is keeping it open in my absence. But she is a clergyman's wife and she has her hands full enough with her own work. So I must get back to-morrow."

"An antique and Berlin-wool shop and a clergyman's wife," murmured Lady Augusta vaguely. "But even in Markyate, though I have heard that the North is hard-headed, you don't stop shop on Sunday, do you?"

"No, but I should be ready for Monday morning." "And you arrived only this afternoon? Did you come directly here from the station?"

"No I took my dressing case to the inn. Fortunately I met in the omnibus the landlady of the inn, Mrs. Newbold, and she was able to give me a very comfortable room."

Lady Augusta without speaking leaned towards the bell pull and summoned her own maid. "Oldfield, tell Mrs. Fanshaw to give orders that the mulberry room is made ready for Miss Bradford, and send William down to the inn for her dressing bag. See that a good fire is lit, and everything made thoroughly comfortable."

Naomi, sitting in her enveloping chair, heard in the most profound amazement. Directly the servant, with a murmured "Very good, my lady," disappeared, she sat forward.

"Oh, but, Lady Augusta," she said deprecatingly, "don't do that. It is not in the least necessary. I shall be quite comfortable where I am. If only you will promise to write, or, better

"I'll go and see Poppy. I shall go back to Markyate with a very pleasant memory of this visit."

Lady Augusta walked over to Naomi's chair and held out a very solemn hand. "You have taken a long, tiring journey, without any assurance of how you would be received, to set before me my duty, Miss Bradford. Anything I can do to mark my gratitude will be done. If you can possibly stay till Monday—"

Naomi shook her head. "This is Poppy," she said faintly. "She needs you now."

"Then we'll go to-morrow together," said Lady Augusta, and something that was uncommonly like a tear softened her hard eyes. "I've been wrong—I see it now. I ought to have accepted the fact after it was accomplished and made the best of it. Other parents in our position have had to do it. I have never seen Poppy's husband, but if he is at all like you, my dear, why then surely I have missed something worth while."

It was a very handsome capitulation. Naomi acknowledged it weakly through her tears.

CHAPTER XXI

Before Naomi Bradford had spent many hours under the roof of Cudham Abbey, unlike many more pretentious people, she left her mark there. The household caught her name with surprising readiness, and understood that she was what might be called an envoy from the other side.

"A more perfect lady I never saw," observed Calway, the first housemaid, whose care was the mulberry room, reserved for the most distinguished guests.

Naomi, in ecstasies over its treasures and its sweet old-world atmosphere, was not aware that it was a signal compliment to herself, the greatest honour Lady Augusta could pay to her. By making her a guest in the mulberry suite she gave the household the cue. Miss Bradford was to be waited on as befitted the most honoured guest Cudham could entertain.

Very well did Naomi fit into her environment in the mulberry room. She stood in front of the big four-post bed, with the priceless carving on the posts, and the equally priceless silk brocade hangings, as before a shrine; she loved the little spindle-legged washing stand in the dressing-room, the tallboy chest, the Chippendale glass, which stood on the polished table, whose beauty was in no way marred or hidden even by a fair linen cloth. She admired and worshipped them with the air of a connoisseur as well as an expert valuer.

To have slept a night in the mulberry room, as she explained to Poppy afterwards, was sufficient reward for the ordeal she had essayed.

Hero Halts Husky Hold-up

NEW YORK, Aug. 2.—The chance to be a hero comes seldom to a street sweeper. His golden moment caught Max Levine with nothing but his brush and a refuse pan, when two robbers careened through a Brooklyn street in a motor car, making their getaway from the scene of a hold-up. But Max used his homely weapons with effect. He flung the pan through the windshield of the car and caused the driver to swerve into a vegetable stand, enabling the capture of both felons. Max was rewarded today. The head of the Department of Sanitation eulogized him publicly as Max stood at dutiful attention in his big chief's office. "How about getting me a little raise?" asked Max. The question has not yet been answered.

For X-Ray Work

NEW YORK, August 1.—New tubes to unlock far reaching healing powers of X-rays are sought by the Radiological Research Institute, the latest United States scientific society. Incorporation of this institute in Delaware is announced by the acting president, of a power now unavailable. Dr. Ernst said, are one of the first objectives. Deeper penetration is sought, and faster action so that the rays can be used to "stop" the image of a moving internal organ, which now appears as a blur.

"X-rays," said a statement by Dr. Ernst and Dr. Rollin H. Stevens of Detroit, secretary of the institute, "are finding rapidly extending use. They relieve infections, skin conditions, pneumonia and asthma; they are the most effective treatment for a common pimple affliction and for boils and carbuncles. They help some kinds of cancer. We now produce X-rays of from 6,000 to 250,000 volts. If we went to 300,000 or 400,000 volts we could get practically radium rays from an X-ray tube; and we know results would be better."

"But we cannot go that high, for we lack the tubes to stand it. One man gets a desirable result but another trying the same treatment fails, sometimes because of irregular output from tubes. In seven years there has been no real improvement in American X-ray tubes, though meanwhile science has gone beyond the capacities of most domestic tubes. Accurate measuring of X-ray dosage is becoming vital. There is no more powerful poison than an overdose of X-rays or radium. For safety the rays should be standardized under government regulation. But we cannot do this with tubes of the present irregular performance. We aim to use research to help produce better American tubes. Europeans are ahead of us in this respect."

Cheaper radium is another objective. Others are American control of its own radium supply, establishment of a central radiological research laboratory, fostering pure radiological research in colleges, cooperation with the National Institute of Health created by congress, and an advisory board of 50 scientists to extend X-
