If your hardwood floors have become bipped, sanded or smooth chipped places with steel wool, then oil by rubbing with pad made of cotton waste covered with cloth, tiled and dipped in linseed oil.

Instead of always folding table-cloths and sheets lengthwise, it is an excellent plan to sometimes fold them the other way, as they are less likely to wear out if the folds are occasionally changed.

sound. And where the Prince has such personal charm, such daring and such love of adventure as Edward Albert, the office is one of unusual interest. When the Prince is traveling, if he is taking any of his horses with him, his Equerry precedes him so that all may be in readiness for the coming of the royal visitor. Should he go without his mounts, the Master of the Horse sees to it that the stables of the land yield the best they have for his master. Everything that pertains to the Prince's mounts comes under his jurisdiction. He picks and buys the new horses, he rides them and sees that they are kept in training, and that they are in readiness whenever wanted.

"I always ride with His Royal Highness," Mr. Metcalf said, as he sat conversing on the porch of the portable house that constitutes the office of the Polo Association at the Meadow Brook Club. It was 4.45 o'clock, and the Equerry had just arrived on the grounds to watch one of the try-out games about to be played by the American team. "In polo matches I generally play two to his Royal Highness' one. We have practiced together so much that we understand each other's game." The Major grew serious as he talked of the Prince. "He is a good, fearless horseman," he said.

He radiated the deep loyalty felt by a soldier for his leader and his friend.

The Prince's Tumbles.
"The same thing would be true of any I might pick among English riders. To be sure, His Royal Highness has fallen a few times, perhaps twelve times all told. But what is that in the course of four years? If he rode once a month it would make the average a high one, but since he is in the saddle every day, it brings the percentage very low; in fact, much lower than that of most good horsemen. I myself have fallen countless times and have broken most of the horses in my body." Major Metcalf is perhaps inclined to misunderstand the publicity that the American press has given the croppers the Prince of Wales has taken. His subtle English wit does not grasp the form of humor with which Americans deal with the falls of royalty. "Not only is His Royal Highness a fine horseman. He stands equally high as a player of squash. He considers it his duty to stay fit so that he may be in good condition to fulfill his job. His body is that of an athlete, and he keeps it so."

Hunts His Polo Ponies.
If Major Metcalf were an American business man, one would describe him as a live wire. He was appointed to his office when the Prince went on his Indian tour. At the time he was serving in his regiment, the Third Skinner's Horse (Bengal Cavalry). He was chosen to represent the Indian Army on his Royal Highness' staff. The A. F. D. told of Maharajahs who offer the best of the raj stables could produce, for on that voyage the Prince had taken so mounts with him. It was the duty of the Equerry to try out and choose those animals most suited to India's royal quest. For six months the Prince and his staff enjoyed the country's finest horses. Major Metcalf continued in his capacity of Equerry throughout the remainder of the Oriental journey, and was then invited to return to England with the Prince in his present office. The farm where the horses belonging to the heir of England's crown are kept is at Princetown, in South Devon. It is there that they are turned out when not in use. During the polo season Prince Edward's ponies are stabled at one of the clubs near London. His ponies are taken to Melton Mowbray, Leicestershire, for the Autumn for hunting.

Have any of you when making soap used an egg beater for stirring it after it is put together? I have a large one I use for that purpose. It takes just about half the time required by stirring.

The leather straps on the handles of umbrellas soon wear out, break, in which case they cannot be mended. However a cross-grain or moire ribbon, if used in place of the leather strap, will prove more practical, more durable, and more attractive. Run the ribbon through the hole in the handle and tie in a loop to slip over the hand. The ends of the ribbon may swing free or be tied into a bow.

To clean tiled floors warm water and soap will be found best, then dry with a soft cloth and finish with a little linseed oil on an old silk handkerchief.

A deafening roar—a cloud of spray—a streak of black—and Z-5 disappears up the Thames in a preparatory run for the Duke of York's race, which is soon to take place. The engines are restricted to a cylinder content of 1,500 c.c.
