Drill Commands Will Replace Rah-Rah-Rahs

OTTAWA, Aug. 28—(CP)—The barking commands of the drill instructor will replace to some extent the rah-rah-rahs on university campuses this fall, it was intimated here today by an announcement of the Department of National War Services.

The department made public a ruling of the National Conference of Canadian Universities providing that all male students physically fit and who are 18 years of age or over, must take military training at the Universities during the coming year.

An official of the department emphasized, in making the announcement, that the compulsion was on the part of the universities and not on the part of the government.

The step will mark a departure from the former method of military training in universities. Previously these institutions offered training in the Canadian Officers Training Corps where students were given advanced work fitting them for commissions. Attendance at Officer's Training Corps schools was purely voluntary.

Now every student must take the primary soldier's training. Those who show special aptitude may take the officer's course. Those already enrolled in the C.O.T.C. will continue with their courses.

Ralston Says Canada Ahead Of '14 Schedule

OTTAWA, Aug. 28.—(CP)—Canada is virtually two divisions ahead in her war effort as against 1914, Defence Minister Ralston said today at a press conference.

The minister announced:

"It will not be long before the 2nd Division is through with its training in England when it may be expected that Lt.-Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton will command an all-Canadian army corps.

The 3rd Division will be concentrated in the Maritime Provinces between Oct. 1 and 15, fully equipped and ready to do battle.

The 4th Division, its units at various points throughout the country, by Dec. 15, will be nearly as ready except for certain equipment.

The minister observed that 13 months after Canada's entry into this war she would have four divisions practically ready for the field. He recalled that in the last war the 2nd Division went overseas in August, 1915.

Col. Ralston was able to announce progress regarding the proposed new tank which, because many of its parts will be susceptible of commercial standardization, may be produced rapidly in great quantity.

Production of Bren guns was satisfactory, he said, and inspectors reported "a first class article" was being made.

Col. Ralston said: "We get too much into the attitude of 'what is this fellow (Hitler) going to do next'. This is just a phase. It will be followed by an offensive (British)," he said.

Asked about Lt.-Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton's motorcycle brigade, an organization of three and three-quarter squadrons, 400 men to a squadron, he said they were "doing a great job."

Five members of the tank committee will work in conjunction with French and British experts developing the new tank.

New Form Of Totalitarianism For Japanese

TOKYO, Aug. 28.—(AP) — Prince Fumimaro Konoye, Japan's premier, charged his political planners today with the task of building a non-party national structure which will "unite the total energies of the state and the people."

The prince was making his first address to 26 leaders who form a committee assigned to the architecture of this national structure now that all Japanese political parties have been dissolved.

He spoke in abstract phrases and his recommendations seemed to veer from direct parallels with other totalitarian systems, but he made it plain that "the new national structure movement aims at superseding the old party politics postulated upon Liberalism."

Parties, he said, have no place in this "common undertaking of both government and people," and he promised the man in the street an opportunity to participate in the new regime. He declared that when the masses had "no opportunity to take part in government other than to vote every three or four years, as under the discarded party system, they could not take to heart the destiny of the country."

Experienced observers believe that Konoye is trying to centralize power without forming a state expressly labelled totalitarian.

AWAKENED WOMAN

Sam told me how wonderful you've been——"

Roxie beamed and flushed with pleasure. "I didn't do nothing!" she said confusedly. "But, my, it's good to have you back, Mrs. Packard, we've certainly missed you! And now do come in to dinner if you and Mr. Neil are ready."

"Where's Dickie?" she asked Neil, when they were seated, "I haven't seen him since I got back!"

"Oh, that's right—I must send for him. He's been living with Sam since you left. Moped about the house so dismally that we thought he was going to cash in, poor chap. I couldn't do anything with him. He kept looking at me reproachfully, as if asking what I'd done with you. It gave me the creeps."

"Funny little Dickie!" said Joyce.

Conversation lagged. Joyce did not want to ask any question covering the time of her absence, thinking she might turn Neil's thoughts toward his mother, and cause him pain. She likewise did not want to tell him anything about her life in San Francisco during that time: it now was resuming the unreality of a bad dream, and she had no wish to revive the memories by talking about it. So she ate silently.

All at once she was aware that Neil was regarding her thoughtfully, with a brooding stare unlike the matter-of-factness she remembered in him.

"Anything wrong, Neil?" she asked nervously.

"No, dear. I was just thinking how wonderful it was to have you back."

"Oh, Neil, you mustn't say things like that to me! I know it's only your kindness, your natural sweetness ——" Joyce's voice choked up, and she left the table. Neil followed her into the living room.

"Well, we won't go into that just now, Frills, if it bores you." Joyce was about to remonstrate with him for his misconstruction of her words when he went hastily on. "By the way, I found something that'll probably interest you—a diary kept by you—by Frills—beginning about the time of our arrival home in Manzanita after our marriage."

"Can I see it, Neil?"

"Sure, I'll get it, just a minute." And he went rather wearily out of the room.

Joyce was worried at the change in Neil. He seemed to have lost all his enthusiasm, all his spirit. "I hope he's not really ill," she thought miserably. "Of course his mother's death was an awful blow. Perhaps a little time . . ." Her mind was running along this course when Neil came back.

"May I look at it with you?" he asked, "I didn't read much of it. Somehow it seemed — not quite right. I thought I'd put it away and read it with you—when you came home." He spoke so quietly that Joyce barely caught the words.

"Neil," she said impulsively, pausing before she opened the book, "I do feel at home here!"

He smiled, a sudden sweet flash that warmed Joyce to the heart and gravely they opened the diary between them.

It was nearly midnight when they laid the book aside. Fascinated, they had read every word of the bold handwriting that danced over its pages, and, fascinated, they had suffered with the curious, lost spirit that had cried out her secret fears in her journal.

"Oh, Neil, it's so terrible!" cried Joyce. "I knew Frills had been a bad lot, but I never thought of her as suffering somehow—I, never thought of her as doing all these things deliberately, in a sort of crazy effort to get back her identity —to remember!"

"Yes," said Neil, "I don't know much about these things, but I should think the medicos might explain that second blow—the time you were thrown from Fire Queen —as a sort of mental snapping, due to the pitch you'd worked yourself up to."

Frills' diary filled in most of the gaps in the story that Neil had gradually pieced out that day for Joyce. From the scattered notes she learned that Frills had been conscious of her loss of memory, but filled with the conviction that all at once, some day, it would come to her whom she was, where she came from—her whole place of life.

"Some deep instinct," the diary said, "kept me from telling anyone. I felt that I must discover it, must work it out, for myself."

And then later, came an entry that made a very deep impression on Joyce. "I know I did wrong to marry Neil Packard without telling him. He's too good a man to be treated so meanly, but I just couldn't tell it. I couldn't tell him. And I had to marry him—not again in a lifetime am I likely to meet a man so surely posessing that which can be depended on. In this crazy world it's something to know that loyalty of that sort can be secured!"

As the diary went on, the entries became more and more excited. "I'm cheating Neil!" Frills cried. He's got a right to a wife who's more than just a unit existing for the time being! I've got to get back my memory! Perhaps drink will do it. Bring on the wine cups—I'll try 'em!"

". . . Why do I take so much perverse pleasure in shocking people around here? Maybe when I get back my memory I'll find I was a small-town school teacher, or somebody who never had a chance to express herself! Well, I'm expressing myself all right these days! All I've got to do it think of something reckless and wild, to be seized with an insane desire to do it! . . ."

Andt hen, all at once, "Arthur Maitland — ugh, how I hate him! Why do I endure him around me? God knows! I flirt with him like a common street woman—yet I love Neil! Why do I do it? Sometimes I feel as if it's to try Neil's patience, to see how much he really will stand from me. There seems to be no limit to his affections!"

". . . I've gone almost the limit and it's done no good! What did I think it would do? God knows! Neil knows—I can see from his face that he knows there's been too much to that affair between Arthur Maitland and me. If he'd only knock me down—a blow, they say a blow will bring back one's memory. But Neil won't—he never will. I'll have to kill myself first. Perhaps that horse that surly brute Fire Queen. But I have a charmed life — a chamed and a damned one! How is this thing going to end?"

And the last entry in the book, in sprawling, blotted characters: "I've been rotten over that baby of Sylvia's. Of course Neil wants it brought on here. But a child—why shou'd I wreck a poor child's life as I'm wrecking Neil's? It's better off where it is—I'm a lost soul now."

"Neil," said Joyce at last, "Neil, doesn't it help to know that Frills did care about you? She did love you."

Neil did not reply to her question, and Joyce saw that he was trembling like a leaf. "Do you think—do you think, Joyce, that things might come out as mother hoped they would? Do you think you could feel that this was home? I shan't bother you much myself, but we might bring on Lawton's child, and do our best with it, between us."

"Oh, Neil, I feel as Frills said, that in this crazy world it's something to know that loyalty like yours exists! . . . Do you want me, now, knowing all this? It's been a sorry business, and it seems to me you've been the victim!"

"No victim about it," he said shortly, "I mean—I do want you—if, well—what about this Ainsworth?"

"Ainsworth — Robert Ainsworth!" Joyce suddenly had an idea. "Neil," she said, "I think I see now what Robert Ainsworth felt that day! I think he must have felt ashamed of his part in the whole affair—I think he must have seen it all, have realized what a splendid person you were, and have felt that he simply couldn't run off with your wife!"

Neil looked at her sideways. "Sounds like the bunk to me. What on earth makes you think that?"

"Well, you see Neil, I never saw him after that day in the woods, and you remember he behaved so queerly, rejecting me by his silence!" Joyce had to swallow hard to keep back the emotion that surged over her at the memory, but she went quickly on.

"I'd always felt so sure that he was an exalted being, somebody finer than the rest of the world, and for him to turn into—into just a cad seemed all wrong. I'd rather be able to think of him without bitterness—and I do feel sure I'm right, that he simply couldn't bring himself to take your wife away . . ."

Neil smiled. "All right with me, darling; think anything you please, as long as you don't think of him too much!"

Joyce regarded him tenderly. "Neil," she said softly, "May I make a confession to you? I've fancied myself so superior to Frills, but I wasn't really nearly as—as keen. It's taken me a terribly long time to find out what she knew all along . . . Neil, dear you're the finest person I've ever known in my life, and I—I love you."

U. S. War Dept. To Mobilize National Guard

WASHINGTON, Aug. 28—(AP)—The War Department plans tentatively to begin mobilization of the National Guard (state militia) under legislation signed by President Roosevelt last night, by calling up 55,000 officers and men Sept. 15 for a year of intensive training.

The men, comprising four infantry divisions, four aircraft squadrons and numerous coast artillery units, are expected to enter camp barely two weeks after completion of the last summer manoeuvres Aug. 31. This would give them a brief period to settle personal affairs.

Tentative War Department plans also call for ordering out 175,000 more guardsmen by Dec. 1, along with 393,000 conscript soldiers who would be drafted by Dec. 15, should the compulsory service bill become law by that time.

All told, some 386,000 guardsmen and reservists were made subject to call by the mobilization act which the President signed. Included are 110,000 active reserve officers, 30,000 regular army reserves, 3,500 enlisted reserves and 242,708 National Guard officers and men.
