No, Mr. Brown

By Gertrude Knevels

The meeting was an evening affair held in a downtown community church, and was preceded by a difficult day. All morning the youngest visitor drove to and fro among her families announcing the news of the roller cut, endeavoring to explain it, suggesting to harassed housewives who never had enough how they might manage on a little less. At the Gilligans'—last call because most dreaded—she met Mike Gilligan, head of the clan. Mike, ex-ditch digger with broken nose and bery breath, just emerging from the tavern opposite his home, where—so he explained—had happened to look in to get a cup of tea.

"It's only a temporary cut in your allowance, Mr. Gilligan," Glibly April ran through the explanation dictated by Miss Grice, Case Supervisor, to her staff that morning. "We hope that in a few weeks an arrangement can be made to resume our former allowances. Meanwhile we advise you to exercise extreme economy and hope you will take advantage of the government's generous food gifts." "Govment? I don't want your rotten canned beef!" The ditch digger flourished hairy fists so close to April's nose that she was forced to take a backward step. "You go back and tell 'em I don't take no cut—not so much white-collared big bugs down to Washington can line their dirty pockets. It's hard enough the way it is, I tell ye. We're all half starved. My kids are hungry."

There was a great deal more of the same sort of thing, to which April said scant heed. The youngest visitor was not deluded, and still she ached with sympathy for Mike and all his kind. To April Day Gilligan was not the shiftless loafer, but the jobless man driven frantic. His voice was the People's Voice, and must be answered.

She slipped her notebook into the pocket of her tweed coat, lapsed suddenly into informality. "Listen, Mike. Are you boys really going to kick up a row at the meeting tonight?" "Are we? We aim to bust the roof in—if they don't leave us have our say. You'll be there to speak up for us, like you promised, Miss Day?"

"Yes," April nodded solemnly. "I'll be there. The Visitors' Association is letting me represent them, though they warn me it may cost me my job. Don't forget you promised not to go too far." "O. K. You don't need to worry." The ditch digger's grin was not too reassuring.

When April mounted the steps of the speakers' platform, the ugly badly-lit hall was crowded. Jerome King, her chief, rose politely and set a chair for his youngest visitor, but he looked—she inwardly chuckled—as if he were biting on nails.

Dear old Jay. It was nice of him being so particularly crabbed because she was risking the job she needed. Jerome knew all about April's finances, had been her grandmother's legal advisor in the days before he exchanged a dwindling law business for an ERA position. Life had done hard things to Jerome King—life and Lorry, his pleasure-mad young wife who only last year had shed her domestic obligations, leaving her two small sons to their father's care.

Jerome King hated the cut in the food allowance as heartily as anyone, but he had scant sympathy for the breach of discipline this meeting represented. Unmoved by heckling, he defended the authorities, gave figures and statistics, deprecated, but insisted upon the necessity for retrenchment. His speech was short and to the point, more so than that of the state official who followed him, who showed too plainly his resentment against increasing back bench murmurs. These were finally stilled by the chairman's declaration that there would be speeches from the floor but only after the viewpoint of the Relief Visitors Organization had been voiced by their representative, Miss April Day.

CHAPTER II

April hardly heard the applause of Gilligan and his pals, so absorbed was she in pulling herself together, in trying to remember her points. She stepped to the front where the light struck sharply on her red-gold hair, her pale and passion-stirred young face. The late comer on the platform, the man who was easing his long legs into the chair back of the speaker, was so close he could
