ACTINOMYCOSIS

Among causes of considerable economic loss in cattle in Canada are several conditions usually classified as "actinomycosis." Among these conditions are certain lesions found in the tongues of cattle which give rise to considerable loss through condemnation at the abattoirs. Investigations have resulted in finding that these lesions are excited by foreign substances gaining entrance to a normal depression in the tongue.

Artificial Light Aids Egg Yield

Much has been written and said regarding the beneficial effects of artificial lights on animal and plant life but it is doubtful if its true value to the farmer-poultryman is fully recognized, says W.T. Scott, head poultryman, Dominion Experimental Station, Harrow, Ont.

If it were possible in Canada to keep birds on range outside in direct sunlight all the year, artificial light would not be a factor of so much importance. When, however, it is necessary to confine the birds to the house for about six months of the year the use of artificial light during the short dull winter days is a sound and helpful practice, he emphasizes.

There are several functions associated with the beneficial use of lights in the hen house that are not generally recognized. Using lights to increase egg production has long been a sound, economical practice with the progressive poultryman, generally under the impression that the longer feeding periods allows for a greater yield of eggs is the natural consequence

Without doubt the increase in the amount of feed consumed is a contributing and important factor in increasing the egg yield but the true function of the light is believed to be the stimulating effect that it has on certain glands that play their part in the process of ovulation and more eggs are laid and a greater number develops as a result of this stimulus.

Due to this all round action there is also a better resistance to disease and a higher fertility in the eggs that are used for reproduction, all important economic features that follow the application of lights in moderation.

During the fall, winter and early spring the active feeding period should be extended by the lighting to about 14 hours each day. Longer periods are likely to offset the advantages to some extent. It has been found by research at the Experimental Station at Harrow that longer periods of light had a tendency to increase broodiness. As a general rule two 60-watt lights are required for 400 square feet of floor space and a reliable time clock with timing resistance should be used to ensure regular intervals of roosting and feeding.
