Bringing up the rear of a convoy, Mousseau's machine struck a hidden obstacle during a blackout, throwing him into a deep ditch. He lay there for half an hour. Then he groped his way to a telephone pay station only to find he was without funds. He jangled the receiver frantically, and finally an emergency operator broke in with an indignant demand to know what all the fuss was about. The injured lad explained his plight and requested that a call be

Seeking Closer Co-operation With British Authorities

OTTAWA, June 9.—(CP)—Immediate steps will be taken to improve on the British government, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian government to throw the productive capacity of Canada in war materials to the support of a new cause, Prime Minister Mackenzie King told the house of Commons today.

As a result of a meeting yesterday between representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the government, Prime Minister Mackenzie King told the house of Commons today. This said Mr. King, was agreed upon as the better course to take after the conference discussed a suggestion from the manufacturers that a minister go to London accompanied by representatives of the manufacturers to clear up any misunderstanding which might exist.

The Prime Minister spoke in answer to a question from Conservative Leader Hanson who wanted to know whether the government intended to set up an advisory committee of men of outstanding ability.

Mr. Hanson also asked whether such a committee could not propose new policies and what arrangements had been made with the committee of manufacturers to further the objects of the association in speeding up and taking their full share of industrial activity for the defence of the Empire and Canada.

Oblivious to huge losses, German tanks and massed infantry advanced against the Weygand line again, June 6. Some French advance posts on the lower Somme were withdrawn to permit anti-tank manoeuvres fuller scope. Along the rest of the front, stretching from the coast to the Maginot line at Mentevy, the Nazis made no impression on the defence system planned by Gen. Weygand in the last two weeks. Organized in depth, French forces let tanks go past outposts, then closed in behind, moving down infantry advances while the tanks were blasted from concealed gun positions.

Tragic aftermath of the first German air raid on Paris are these two pictures, according to French caption. Censor describes top photo as bodies of school children slain by Nazi bombs, lower one as other civilian victims among the 254 killed during the raid.

The French channel port of Dunkirk, from whence 335,000 Allied troops were rescued from thelanders trap, is now in German hands. To enable the last possible man of the trapped Allied army to be rescued, 15,000 German infantrymen. An authoritative British source said that regardless of speculation on the scene of the next German attack, it might not be necessary for Gen. Maxime Weygand, Allied generalissimo, "to wait to be attacked at all." French positions stretch for 200 miles from the sea to the Maginot line, and are reinforced by strong natural obstacles at most places. In daring raids the British navy blocked Zebrugge harbor by sinking cement-filled ships across its mouth.
