BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)
TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE
Look things over. Count the score. Then go back and look once more.
—Mrs. Quack.

"I've found it, my dear! I've found it!" cried Mr. Quack the Mallard Duck as he joined Mrs. Quack and their flock on the Big River. Mrs. Quack had never seen him more excited.
"Just what have you found?" asked Mrs. Quack. The others gathered around to listen.
"I have found where Mr. and Mrs. Black Duck go early every morning, and where they often stay all day. I have found out why they go. And I think perhaps I have found out how it is that they can stay around here all winter instead of having to go to the Sunny South as I have always thought we must do."
Mrs. Quack shook her head to show that she couldn't believe all this. "You will have to show me," said she.
"Of course my dear. Of course. We will go there tomorrow morning. You will be surprised just as I was. I never was more surprised in all my life," quacked her handsome mate.
"Will it be safe for the flock to go?" asked Mrs. Quack. "I wouldn't be willing to leave them without a leader for even a short time. Anything can happen these days," she added.
Early the next morning Mr. Quack led the way up the Big River. Ducks are strong of wing and fly fast. A few miles mean little to them. A few miles up the Big River they saw ahead of them a city. It was quite a big city. In their long journeys between their summer and winter homes Mr. and Mrs. Quack had seen many cities, passing them at a distance or very high above them. This city was right on the shore of the Big River. It seemed as if the Big River cut right through it.
As they drew near the edge of the city Mrs. Quack began to grow anxious. Was Mr. Quack going to lead them right through it? She didn't like it, but before she had made up her mind to say so Mr. Quack swung around so as to light up wind on the water.

Early the next morning Mr. Quack led the way up the Big River

"There's a brook coming in over there," quacked he. Sure enough there was a brook coming into the Big River. It flowed under a road and beneath a railroad. It didn't look inviting. It was no bigger than Laughing Brook.
"I see it," said Mrs. Quack. "What of it?"
"We are going up it a little way," said Mr. Quack.
"We're what?" cried Mrs. Quack. She looked as if she thought she couldn't have heard right.
"We are going up that brook just a little way," repeated Mr. Quack.
Mrs. Quack had opened her bill to say they were going to do nothing of the sort when there was a whistle of stout wings and two Ducks flew over their heads. They had come up the Big River had turned and now were headed straight for the brook. They flew high over the road and up the brook the way Mr. and Mrs. Black Duck had gone and almost at once they saw a scene such as all but Mr. Quack had never dreamed of seeing. I suspect that could they have rubbed their eyes they would have done so just to make sure they were not seeing what they seemed to be seeing. There was no sign of the city, near as it was. Instead there were trees and meadows and several small ponds. Beyond these was a bigger one. In these and in the brook were Ducks and more Ducks all hurrying toward a place between the ponds where from a tall a Man was throwing out lovely yellow corn while all around him Ducks were crowding each other as they picked up the corn.
It was too good to be true. And that is how Mrs. Quack felt. They were in the city park, but of course she knew nothing about parks.
