

INTERNATIONAL BANKING AND HOME COUNTRIES

The facts apparently brought out that, far in the money trust investigation, so far as it touched on the activities of international banking in the coffee trade of Brazil, are not without interest. It was brought out in evidence by counsel for the government committee that loans were made by the state of Sao Paulo by three New York banking concerns, with which were associated various foreign capitalists of institutions. So far the transaction was only one that takes place all the time and is part of the necessary business of international finance. But one of the committee appointed to manage the loan was persuaded by counsel to give the public certain details in regard to its terms, and among these it appears that it was stipulated that the borrower, was to restrict its output, of which, we do not mistake, a very large part comes to the United States, there to be consumed. As our readers know, the United States consumes great quantities of the staple in question in the same way that Britain does tea. It appears from the reports in the testimony that after such restriction of output, on the United States market at least, the price doubled for the Brazilian article. It also appears that the profit on the first $1,000,000 of the loan was 9 per cent. and on the remainder 11 per cent. As investments go, these would seem to be fair profits.

It appears, however, from the testimony of one of the witnesses that one of the New York banks joined in the loan with a patriotic motive for its investment; the witness said that he regarded the loan as of great benefit to the United States and that the bank made it reluctantly to exploit American trade with South America and that they wanted to see our flag there. No one can find fault with such motives that believe in the great part that finance and commerce can play in a nation's improved standing with others, but no surprise need be felt if, while this motive is respected on the one hand, on the other a drawback to its good results so far as the home country is concerned seems apparent in the fact that a staple much used by that country's inhabitants is very much increased in price. Much blame is put upon financiers for the working of economic laws for which they are not responsible, but in the case under discussion no one can deny that the price has been raised and that such increase does not come out of the pockets of those that negotiated the loan, and those that are compelled to pay the increase can hardly be expected to look at the transaction entirely on its patriotic side.

Undoubtedly this piece of financing means something else to Brazil and the state of Sao Paulo than a mere hold-up for the sake of getting the DAILY RECIPES. The Cooking of Celery.

Celery is really not as much used as an ordinary vegetable as it deserves to be. Yet it is a most economical one for general use, especially as the stalks, which are too coarse for eating raw, come in admirably for cooking. The simplest form of celery cooking is to boil the stalks and serve them with white sauce poured over. But there are many other ways which are equally nice.

Brown Celery Steak. Cut the stalks of celery into six inch lengths and scrape away any brown portions. Lay in salted water for a few minutes to crisp, then boil in slightly salted water for an hour, or until the celery is quite tender.

Meanwhile chop a small English onion and fry till a rich brown in a little butter. Place the fried onion in a pan and, in the same frying pan stir a tablespoonful of flour, and, if necessary, a little more butter. The flour should be quite moist. Stir and cook this till it assumes a delicate brown color, but do not over-cook or burn the flour, or the dish will be spoiled.
