

BETTER BRAN FLAKES

Cheering for breakfast. A treat for lunch. Kellogg's Pep Bran Flakes have the famous flavor of PEP. The matchless goodness of crunchy whole wheat. And Bran! There's just enough added to be mildly laxative. Just one taste and you'll agree that Kellogg's Pep Bran Flakes are better bran flakes. In the red-and-green package. Made by Kellogg in London, Ontario.

Married Quarters

Continued

"I haven't got anything the matter with me, Mrs. Bradford. I've got the right number of legs and arms and teeth and things," she said, with a little petulant laugh. "Anyway, Jim is quite satisfied."

"And we've got to be my pretty lamb," Mrs. Bradford flashed back. "You must excuse Jim's mother. It's the price you've got to pay for doing it like this. Now tell me every single solitary thing about it. Where did you meet him first?"

"At my Aunt Victoria's hospital at Stanton Place; didn't he even tell you that?"

"No; he grumbled about the place till we thought they hadn't been good to him there. One day I put it to him straight and then when he said how kind everybody had been, father and me wanted to send a five-pound note to help."

"Why didn't you? It would have amused Aunt Victoria immensely," said Poppy demurely. She had a strange sense of unreality, and no sort of nearness to the plain elderly woman with the smoothly brushed, iron-grey hair done into a tight knob behind the straight, voluminous gown entirely guiltless of any dressmaker's art, but merely a covering, the collar of hand-made crochet, and the big gold brooch containing a coloured photograph of her son who had fallen in the fight, Jim had tried to describe it all faithfully in many talks, and she could not honestly say that he had tried to glorify any of it. But here, in intimate touch, it just seemed impossible, something with which she had no concern, nor ever could have any concern. It was like calling with her mother at a cottage in Cudham, with a little covered basket and the right to lift the lid of the saucepan on the side of the stove to see what was cooking for the cottage dinner.

Entirely unconscious of the substrata of her new daughter's thoughts, Mrs. Bradford continued to study and admire her sweet looks and to be rather horrified at the length and general skimpieness of her skirts, which showed a considerable portion of a very fascinating ankle and leg.

"You don't look no more than a rabbit, child," she said. "A married woman! Nonsense; you can't be my Jim's wife! My, but he'll be to good to ye, and take passing good care o'ee. Jes like a bit of fine china, and maybe as easily broke."

"No such thing, I'm very tough. You should see me scrub floors at Stanton Place; I voted the best scrubber in the hospital. I didn't shirk a single corner."

"Didn't ye, though? Well, you won't hev to do no scrubbing here, my pretty lamb; I think I'll be callin' ye that for always now. When you and Jim get a little house somewhere—it'll surely run to a little maid, mornings at least. And while you're here, I'll teach you a bit o'housekeeping, and how to make a tasty bite o' food. You and me will have cosy mornings in the kitchen, gettin' to know one another better. He's a good lad, my lad; he deserves to be happy, my dear."

"Oh, I know he is, and I hope he is going to be happy," said Poppy; but there was the faintest inflection of doubt in her voice. "Is this his room, and all these funny pictures him at various stages? Oh! this is the one I like, and mean to have! He looks exactly like a Botticelli angel."

Mrs. Bradford had not the faintest idea what a Botticelli angel was, but concluded to take it as complimentary. The picture referred to was a coloured photograph of a small, round-eyed, delicious little boy about four, with fair curls set in close order round a shapely little head, a beautiful child picture indeed, if ever there was one!

Poppy kissed it, and pressed it rapturously to her breast.

"Yes, this is Jim's room. It happened to be the nearest, but you'll go to the spare bedroom, won't you? You see, all my boys liked the little bed."

Poppy received this hint in complete composure.

"But what's in here?" she asked, marching to the communicating door. "Whose room was this?"

"That was Michael's room," she said, in the hushed full tone of the mother who has given up.

"Can't we use it, then? I'll have it for mine if you don't mind; I don't want spare bedrooms, thank you, Mrs. Bradford. I'd like to have the run of these two rooms, thank you very much and I shall be pleased to have cosy mornings in the kitchen, and learn to make the things Jimmie likes," she added, feeling that some little concession was due.

"Good; me dear, Slattery's Ann—"

"What on earth is Slattery's Ann?" asked Poppy, open-eyed.

"She's a half-baked creature who works in the shop half the time, and I git her of a morning."

"But wouldn't it be better to have a really good servant?" asked Poppy straightly. "I'm sure it must make you tired to do so much work, and you oughtn't, you know. I can't see that there is the slightest need."

"That's what they're always saying, me dear, but, you see, when a woman has pattered so long among her own caucepans, and is as particular about her dishcloths as I am, she don't take kindly even to what they call a good servant. I've never seen one myself, though I believe there might be one or two in the world."

Poppy flashed her memory back to the smoothness of the domestic system at Cudham Abbey. No visible sign of work or discomfort was ever to be seen there; it was done mysteriously, silently, possibly at hours when the favoured orderlies of the system slept and the result was absolute comfort, ease, grace and beauty. She suddenly felt as if a covering had been drawn aside and the bones of a skeleton had been revealed.

When Bradford came in search presently, he was struck by the bewildered expression on her face. There was undoubtedly fear in her eyes.

CHAPTER XIII

Once more a letter relating to the doings of her wayward niece upset the fair order of Victoria Stanton Pole's life.

"Good heavens!" she cried, and dropping it, began to weep. This was a sight so amazing and disconcerting to Betty Neville that she sprang to her side, kneeling beside her, trying to grasp her hands.

Closing Out Sale

There appears elsewhere in this issue a "Closing Out Business Sale" ad for T. G. Ives, Limited, Montague. The owner T. G. Ives has been in this business stand for nineteen years. Mr. Ives has also been associated with Durant Motors of Canada, Limited, Toronto—selling their automobiles and trucks for the past eight years, and has led the Maritime Provinces in retail sales for Durant Products for the last four years. He opened up a Show Room at Charlottetown in April 1928, where business has steadily been on the increase—adding the Marmon Straight Eight for 1930.

Mr. Ives has now decided to devote all his time to the automobile business and is selling out his merchandise business at Montague. Here is a rare opportunity for some man with ambition and small capital to get into business for himself in one of the best business centres in Prince Edward Island.
