Extraordinary Murder Trial

The jury should, however, not allow themselves to be influenced by the atmosphere of the case. In one of her letters the woman prisoner had written: "He (the husband) has the right by law to all that you have the right to by nature and by love."

"If that nonsense means anything," commented the judge, "it means that the love of a husband for his wife is something improper because marriage is recognized by law; that illicit love, the love of a woman that is clandestine, for her lover, is something grand and noble. I think you will feel disgust at that observation, but your feelings of disgust will not run away with you."

After concisely explaining to the jury the law regarding murder and manslaughter, Justice Shearman dealt with the actual evidence regarding the commission of the crime by the male prisoner, Bywaters. He then took up the case of Mrs. Thompson. If the jury came to the conclusion that a murder was committed by Bywaters the question then would arise, was the woman a party to it? Was it an arranged thing between them? If a woman asked a man to murder another man and she believed he would do it, and he actually did it, then she also was guilty of murder. If she had told Bywaters earlier that evening to be there that night, saw him there under her directions and information, and knew perfectly well that he was there to murder, then the question rose of aiding and abetting, which meant giving help to murderers.

The necessary absence of evidence made the letters of great importance said His Lordship, and he proceeded to discuss them, reading extracts from them as he went along. All these letters were written by Mrs. Thompson and the prosecution alleged that from the beginning to the end she was inciting the man to assist her, poisoning her husband. In the end if they thought poisoning was no longer possible and the man had read "Bella Donna" without seeing how the book would be of use to them, would they not inaturally seek some other method to accomplish their object?

Was It Arranged.

The question for the jury was: Was the murder an arranged thing between the woman and the man? He could accept the law as laid down by the solicitor-general that if one hired an assassin and said, "Here is money," and there was a bargain that the assassin should go out and commit a murder the person who hired the assassin was guilty of murder. That was commonsense. If the woman said to the man, "I want this man murdered," and he promised to do it, and as soon as he got an opportunity murdered the man, then she was also guilty of murder. If they thought Bywaters had a knife in his pocket and intended to murder Thompson it necessarily followed that she knew he was going to do it.

Bywaters and Mrs. Thompson met at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon of the day on which Thompson was killed and at 12.30 o'clock the husband was lying dead. Two minutes after the murder happened Mrs. Thompson was shielding the man and was not speaking the truth. It was perfectly clear she was concealing things and practising a series of deceptions. Was she really out of her mind at that time? After she saw Bywaters at the police station, she, by her expression of, "God, why did he do it, I didn't want him to do it," was throwing the blame on him and excusing herself. Was she an active partner in the crime? Did she ask him to go there? Did she know he was coming, and were the jury satisfied she was directly implicated in the murder

"Her story is that she knew nothing about it," said the judge, "and that the references in her letters to the poisoning of her husband were simply to make a show before Bywaters. You will not convict her unless you are satisfied he and she agreed to murder the man Thompson; that she knew Bywaters was going to do it; that she directed him to do it; and he was doing it by an arrangement between the two of them."

Hungarian Turkeys Coming To Canada

Will Lower Prices Several Cents Per Pound, Thinks General Gunn

ST. THOMAS, Ont., December 15.—Orders for turkeys imported from Hungary are being taken by commission men in this city at 38c a pound, according to reports received yesterday. The European birds are said to be of excellent quality and to dress from 10 to 12 pounds. It is believed that the introduction of these turkeys will have a tendency to lower the prices of the local product, when brought around the 50 cent mark last year.

A Sweetheart at Thirty

"Esther says James may come by himself."

"Oh, if he does! Vi cried. "If he does, I'll never let him go back Do you think he will?"

WE SAIL AWAY

Chapter 113

Almost before I realized it, the two weeks were over and my wedding day had arrived.

I should not have stayed up in the country so long—but there was something I wanted to accomplish there, and though I failed or thought I failed to do it the fault was not my own, and the failure was not complete even so one on."

"You said we should be married in the early Spring," I protested, once to Francis—his Mother had me almost all day, and our visits with each other were few and short.

"Do you know it's almost Spring, he asked.

"but only a little while ago Esther came down for Christmas."

"Yes, and after ten days or so you went up to the country where adv of my heart, you stayed an entire month—in spite of your lover's protesets. You came back a little after the middle of February, and it is now the first of March."

I thought about it, then laughed and kissed him.

"I never had a sense of time," I told him. "And now I must run away from you, for your mother insists that I have no negligee nice enough to do, and her dressmaker is waiting for me to try

And Francis let me go, with a little humorous grin at the mention of his Mother's name.

Our boat was to sail at 2 in the afternoon, so the wedding was planned for eleven o'clock. "I don't approve of the hour—it should be noon," Mrs. Meade complained—then there was to be a wedding breakfast, and we were to leave in the car at one thirty for the pier.

The car will come for you at your apartment at ten, and you're to dress here. Everything will be ready," Mrs. Meade told me the day before.

And meekly I agreed—glad, indeed, to agree to anything she planned just now

The night before Violet and I packed my trunk—a new one Francis sent around, while I discarded practically all my old possessions and put in the lovely new things Francis' mother had chosen—a trunkful in themselves. I had rather a sentimental feeling about these old clothes, made from remnants that I had shopped days to find at my price, and smart in spite of their little cost. But Vi had no such feeling. She calmly made them into a bundle to be given away, and enthused generously over the lovliness of the new things.

But never, when she was sad, or when she was happy did she say a word about Bud!

And finally I felt I must know more about it. We were packing—Vi was all ready to leave the next day and only a few things remained to go in my trunk. It was late at night, but both of us were too excited to sleep.

"Bud will be at the wedding tomorrow," I began, trying to open the conversation casually.

"I know At least, I suppose so," Vi answered, her cheeks paling a little.

"Of course, I'll have to see him then, Aunt Enid It isn't that we have quarerled—I stuck to him loyally all through the trial, all through the time when so many awful suspicions about him were going about. It was Bud who broke our engagement——"

Only because he felt he couldn't offer a name that had a stain on it Once he cleared off the stain as he did when the trial was ended——"

"He was in no hurry to renew the engagement. Vi broke in. "It was a week it was the day you came home from the country, before he said anything about it, though he had come around a lot in the meantime. By then, I began to realize that Bud was too sure of me. He knew I'd say yes as soon as he asked me to marry him again, so he was in no hurry to ask. And when he did, I did him I was not sure, and to please not come around until I had made up my mind."

Her blue eyes were very intense Vi was feeling tragedy as only 19 can feel it.

"But aren't you sure? What do you think you'll do?"

"I don't know. It's a question of how long I can stick it out. Of course there's no one but Bud, there never will be—I'll write and let you know."

And with that I had to be content—admiring this new self possessed Violet, as indeed Bud must have admired her, and feared her a little too.

There was nothing in her manner during the wedding to indicate anything but a friendly interest in Bud—though I could not observe them well, for I was in the centre of all the bustle and excitement.

As it was such a quiet affair, only a few very intimate friends were there and of my own circle only Helen and Toby and Bud. The bright-eyed Cecile was present, and so was Franc's partner. I wore a very simple white satin, and changed quickly into my suit when the ceremony and the luncheon were over. Violet, in a frock Mrs. Meade had ordered for her, looked adorable as my sole attendant and Bud's eyes never left her

And then at the height of festivity, while our guests were ing, Francis and I slipped before anyone knew we ing. And an hour later, in my fur coat, I stood at of the ship, watching the her out of the dock—wish wistful-eyed Violet was as I was then.

It is regretable that a com list of the deceased presidents not be given, as all the have not been preserved at hand, however, contain names of William Mitchell Reddin, Hon. Edward (late chief justice) Dennis Charles Quirk, William worth, Hon Edward Whelan James Warburton, Cor Little, Daniel Brenan, and in recent years, James Byrne, Kelly and W. C. Desbrisay. Quite a number of others serving have occupied this honored position, but space does not permit mention of them at

The Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald referred to in the foregoing was a Catholic priest who many years labored with zeal and success as Parish at Charlottetown. This was a small mission, there some two thousand all told in the town Less than half this number prised his flock, but under ing conditions his task imposed a heavy burden missionary. He was a man, whole-souled and unaffecting, a gifted speaker, spirited citizen and a friend. We have learned our older citizens. Protestant and Catholics, that genuine regret was felt at his departure sphere of labor, and a sketch of the Benevolent Society would be altogether complete without this slight tribute to the worth of him who one of the leading spirits founded it and afterwards one of its foremost benefactors.

The objects of this society of a threefold character, relief of the poor of all races, the perpetuation of national sentiment; and the advance of works of benevolence. first object has always been carried out to the full extent society's means. The second been loyally observed. It is that the national festival never been allowed to pass the society was founded being duly celebrated. It is truly true to say that every benevolence in the community received warm sympathy and ral support from the society its members individually. one of its emblems is the surmounted by the crown, her is the shamrock of land.

The society has an history extending back eighty-one years, and has membership as large if er than it ever has been financially strong, and branches have been established outlying districts, one at with a strong membership owner of a good public The branch at Souris also large public hall, and branch has recently been at St. Ann's Lot 22, large membership also. bers of this organization ly proud of its record, and is no reason why it should hold as enviable a position generations to come as it cupied since it was founded
