THE WOMAN HE MARRIED

BY JANE PHELPS

MRS. STOWELL—NAN'S GOOD ANGEL

Chapter 25

What did Mrs. Stowell mean? I asked myself over and over as I put the dinner on the table, and tried to keep my attention on what Dick was saying, but without success. She had said I must let her help me, that I should have pretty things and that she would motor over in the morning.

Mingled with the feeling that perhaps in some way she was to be my good angel, was also a feeling of embarrassment—almost shame. What must she think of me? And would she blame Dick? I mustn't let her do that—if I could avoid it, because aside from not having money enough to do as I wished, Dick was awfully good to me.

I was feverishly anxious to get Dick started off in the morning. Not that I expected Mrs. Stowell so early, but I wanted to have the work all done before she came—if she really did come, which I hardly believed, much as I wanted to. Then, too, I had been afriad for some time that tradesmen would come early, purposely to catch Dick, and ask for payment of their bills.

I put the flat in order, dressed Junior, then myself, I hated to have her find me in working clothes. Then I sat down to wait, too nervous to attempt sewing, altho I seldom was idle.

About 11 o'clock I heard the honk-honk of a motor. It was she. My heart beat fast and my limbs trembled as I hurried to push the button that opened the street door. One of the things of which I had become ashamed—that little click click, that told of the cheapness of my home.

"Good morning, my dear," she said brightly, from the second landing, as she stopped to rest a moment. I had gone out into the hall after opening the door for her, and stood waiting, Junior in my arms. Then, "How's the baby?"

"He's wonderfully well, I said as I placed a chair for her, and noted with embarrassment that she laid her hand over her heart as if the climbing had been too much for her. "It was so good of you to come." In spite of my determination not to again give way before her, tears rushed to my eyes.

"There! Don't feel badly any longer. You must let me be your banker. Get some paper and pencil and see just where you stand."

"Oh, I couldn't think of doing such a thing! I sobbed. "I couldn't repay you for ever and ever so long. Perhaps never. Then what would your husband think?"

"He won't think anything because he will know nothing about it. I have a little money of my own."

I once more objected, yet I also hoped.

"You must let me, my dear. I can afford it, and no one but we two will ever know. I have my own bank account. Mr. Stowell never questions me, or looks at it. Now run and get the bills—every one of them, mind!"

I gathered the bills together from their various hiding places, and with hot cheeks and trembling hands I commenced to sort them and to put the amounts upon the paper. Some of hem were very small others loomed large to me; altho I knew before she spoke that they must seem ridiculous to Mrs. Stowell—they would perhaps be no more than the weekly bills of her establishment.

"You mustn't blame Dick," I replied to some remark she made "My sickness cost me more than we had planned and I couldn't help getting in debt. But Dick is so funny about such things, he even went so far as to say he would do what Mr. Crawford did, and advertise he wouldn't pay my bills if I had done as Mrs. Crawford had, and run him in debt. Oh, I should die if he ever did such a thing!"

"He won't because he never will know you were in debt." Then, "Let me see if you have added it correctly. Yes, $225.50. The very idea of your worrying your pretty little head over a trifle like that! You look half sick, and I believe it is because of these," she laid her hands on the pile of bills. "Are you sure this is all?"

"Yes ' indeed!" I had for the moment forgotten the things I had had charged on Clara Watson's account, but as they flashed over me, I knew I would not have the courage to confess them. Some way they would be harder to explain than the house bills.

Mrs. Stowell counted out $250 from a roll which looked as if she had several times that sum. She laid it on the table and said:

"Get on your things and I will take you around to pay those bills, then for a ride in the park. Bring the baby. It will do him good. The air is delightful."

Wanted :
New Capital for New Telephones

Every new telephone adds to the potential value of your telephone.....

It is another point you may desire to call some day. It is another possible client or customer able to reach you quickly and conveniently.

If this Company cannot fill its orders for new telephones, the growing business of the community is checked. The prosperity of everyone is affected.

Under normal conditions of management, switchboards large enough to take care of future growth must be installed far in advance of the time when the new telephone numbers will be called for.

Underground and overhead cables and lines must be laid out far ahead of spreading city pavements.

The need for new exchanges must be anticipated by the purchase of suitable sites and planning of adequate buildings.

Telephone instruments and supplies must be stocked in abundance.

These are commonplaces of good management in normal times, and this Company has long been in the habit of making such provision.

But the world shortage of supplies compelled the Company to use up its safety margin, without being able to create new resources of switchboard capacity, or to lay enough new underground cable conduits, or erect cables and lines, or obtain sufficient new equipment to take care of prospective business.

To-day the demand for new telephones is enormous. The Company is doing its utmost to meet this demand, but this cannot be done without thousands of dollars of capital, and our capital is practically exhausted. Provision for the future is still to be solved.

Labor costs, as everyone knows, were never so high. Material is scarce and costly; some supplies are as high as 400 p. c. over 1914 prices.

AND MOST OF THESE THINGS MUST BE PAID FOR AND READY FOR USE LONG BEFORE THEY COMMENCE TO BRING IN REVENUE.

These are some of the reasons why more capital for our Company is necessary. The other advertisements of this series will show:

That this capital can only be raised by paying a return;

That the Company must be able to offer a return high enough to attract investors who are constantly being offered other desirable investments;

That the Company cannot offer and attract investors who are constantly being offered other desirable investments;

That the Company cannot offer an attractive return out of present earnings;

That telephone rates must, therefore, be increased.

The Telephone Co. of P. E. Island
