THEY HAD TO SEE PARIS

By Homer Croy

Pike continued to pour out his feelings. The little go-between grew more and more indignant and, snatching up his black bag, hurried out to the marquis, and going off to one side, the two began to talk together.

When Mrs. Peters had seen the lawyer arrive she knew what he wanted and she had been waiting anxiously while the two talked. She had thought of going into the salon on some pretext, but the lawyer had not asked for her. Maybe Pike would call her; she wished she hadn't been so harsh toward him. She now entered, smiling, but uneasy. She knew that everything depended on what would be done during the next few moments.

"Pike," she began in the friendly tone she usually had for him—everything was forgiven, her manner said—"that was the lawyer. Did you get it settled?"

"Yes." Mrs. Peters breathed with relief. "How much did he want?" Pike told her.

Mrs. Peters's face fell. It was more than she had expected. Then she smiled—it could be arranged some way.

"What did you tell him?" she asked eagerly.

"I told him to get out."

"You—you don't mean you told him you wouldn't pay it?" she cried.

"Well, we will pay it." Her voice rose almost to a shriek. "You're not going to ruin things again—I'll not have it. You can't turn me aside like this—me and Opal. I'll go out and see him myself."

Never had Pike seen his wife have such fierceness, such determination. His heart pounded within him and in spite of himself he had sudden fear of her. He must conciliate her.

"Now, looky here, Idy," he began. "You needn't come that," she shrieked. "For once, I'm going to have my own way. I'm going out and tell him we'll pay it." She started for the door.

Pike's indignation leaped up. Pike could be imposed on just so much; after a certain measure he rebelled, and now the breaking point had come.

"I'm not going to take this," he said to himself. "I've given in all that I am going to. I've been kicked around until I'm tired of it. We're going to fight it out right here together. General Grant had the right idea."

He caught hold of her with sudden determination.

"You're not going. You'll stay right here until I tell you something."

"I'm going—I'm going," she shrieked as she struggled.

But he did not give way. Breathless, she paused, fierceness written in every line.

"I said I was going to tell you something," Pike began, himself breathless, "and I'm going to tell it to you if I have to tell it to you before your Jean-Marie and his blood-sucking lawyer."

"I won't listen," she sobbed, suddenly giving way to tears.

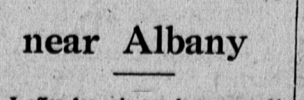

"Yes, you will," he said, and pulled her hands away from her ears.

For a few moments she interrupted him, then began to listen. Soon Pike was talking more naturally.

"Don't get excited. Idy—just hold your horses. I know you are crazy to have a title hanging around the house, but what good would it do us if we had it? About as much good as a dead battery. There haven't been any real titles in France since the Revolution some of the people still use them, but they are just courtesy titles and mean about as much as squire does in Clearwater, and yet a whole lot of Americans just about break their necks to get one in the family. Why American girls run after them is more'n I know. Any old thing with a handle in his name looks good to them. If they saw the same feller back home, they wouldn't give him a pleasant look, but when they see him over here they think he's the finest thing on the Christmas tree. I've been making some inquiries into this French marriage business, and the more I know about it the colder I get on the prospect on Suppo. In Opal took little Lord Fauntleroy, do you know what would happen? In the first place, she'd probably live ever here and about once every two years you'd see her. Even if you took a notion to live, here, she'd be absorbed by his family and you'd be left lookin' out the window. French families are as tight as a new rain barrel. They'd all be agin' her and she couldn't edge in a word without them comin' down on her. They look at marriage different in France from what we do—a woman hasn't any liberty in France. A husband holds a wife so completely in his hand that she has to put up with whatever he does. She hasn't any come-back. Why, a wife can't even have a bank account unless her husband gives his permission. That's a sample of the difference between their way and ours. Their way may be better than ours, but it's pretty hard on an American girl to be pitched into it. Opal could probably put up with this, but suppose that after a while the two turtle doves got to fightin'—do you know what would happen? He'd get the best of it—especially when it's a Frenchman and a Foreign woman. If they went to court she'd get it where the chicken got the axe. A woman can't get a divorce in France unless the husband wants to give it to her and all the time he is scouting around and not particular about where he's going—and she's got to set at home and hope that some day he'll see the error of his ways. Supposin' she won't stand it any longer and wants a divorce. She can have it, but she has to 'settle' something on him. It ought to be a flat-iron, but it's got to be something they have at banks, and even after she's settled he can take the title away from her if he wants to. It seems to me it's a high price to pay just to have a title to show company. But considering him as a man, I can't understand why she wants him—why, he is only six years younger than I am. And I'm beginning to discover I ain't as young as I used to be—especially just before a storm. Think of this bird wanting two hundred thousand dollars to make our Opal happy. I thought he was trying to kid me, but he meant it. Hell's huckleberry! I wouldn't give him the allowance on a turned-in car."

"—with all his worldly goods"

HERE, in this old strong-box, so long guarded and locked, is his "estate" . . . the "worldly goods" which he has bequeathed to her.

One by one her adviser takes out the temptingly engraved certificates and examines them. One by one he lays them down with a sorrowful shake of the head—

Slowly the truth dawns upon her. Those wonderful purchases that were to make them rich . . . independent. These speculations that were to lead them to fortune . . . many of them now are WORTHLESS!

But at the bottom of the box there lies an unpretentious document, which suddenly she recognizes. It cannot have depreciated. It must still be safe and sure . . .

She reaches in and draws forth his Life Insurance Policy.

Amid the wreckage of thousands of estates, Life Insurance stands as the final and enduring refuge in time of need.

It is the one investment no man can afford to be without.

One tasteless spoonful in water neutralizes many times its volume in acid. The results are immediate, with no bad after-effects. Once you learn this fact, you will never deal with excess acid in the crude ways. Go learn—now—why this method is supreme.

Be sure to get the genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia, prescribed by physicians for 50 years in correcting excess acids. Each bottle contains full directions—any druggist.
