Wisdom's Gate

By Margaret Ayer Barnes

They had been in the house for a week now, and nearly all of every day his mother had been busy in it. Bertie had trotted a few feet behind her on his sturdy three-year-old legs as she ran up and down stairs and unpacked trunks and packing cases. Most of them were full of quite ordinary linen and books and silver, which Bertie had learned by this time were in houses everywhere, but a few contained things that made him think of Peiping. When he saw them, he suddenly remembered the popeyed fishes with the trailing tissue tails in the pond in the groto and the little-boy-sized pine tree that he could climb so easily, and all the yellow servants with flat, secret faces who had always smiled at him, whose duties in this new house were assumed by Vesta, the sharp-faced general housework girl who wasn't so polite.

All this he had said to his mother, and once she had cried out suddenly, "Go on telling me about it, Bertie." But when he had complied she had merely continued working, hands busy, eyes vague, not seeming to pay much attention. "As if I was the radio" he had complained reproachfully. Cicily had laughed at that. "Darling," she had said, "you are rather like the radio. You keep me from thinking."

"I like to think," he had declared stoutly. It was hard to explain exactly what he meant. He tried to, however. "When I think I pretend. Then I am where I like."

"Tell me where you would like to be," she had said in her pre-occupied voice. And when he had said that he would like to be climbing his little pine tree, his eyes had grown wide and wistful and Cicily had thought, He's too beautiful — he looks like a little Italian beggar. That was the most irresistible thing she could think of with which to compare him, and he really did resemble one — only cleaner, of course — with those shining brown eyes and his dark tumbled curls and his smooth olive skin, still soft and babyish, not yet quite that of a little boy.

He looked like Belle's daughter too, but more like Albert than they did. Fourteen, eleven and eight they were, and the eldest one, who was just six's age, seemed a miniature young lady, Sis still looked like a child. She had her grandmother's brown eyes, clear but not dark, and the straight brown hair of her earlier pictures. She looked like an English child, healthy and simple, and was dressed like one too, in a blue woolen frock as plain as a uniform. John, her twin brother, resembled her in feature but not in expression. John was imaginative and Sis was very practical. He was eager and sensitive, she was steady and calm. Robin, her nine-year-old, was a towheaded freckle-faced urchin who had inherited her blondness together with Jack's snub nose and his pleasant, friendly twinkle. The children were having this early supper alone because Albert and Cicily were going out to dinner which hadn't yet happened since they had come back to Lakewood. An informal buffet supper with an old friend of Cicily's, Sally MacLeod, who had lost all her money — as so many people seemed to have done while Cicily was in China — and was living very simply in her house by the lake. The last plate on its shelf, the last cup on its hook. Then she reentered the dining room. She regarded her children with affectionate eyes. They looked so nice and so normal eating that simple supper. She found herself thinking that, so far as they were concerned, economy would build character. Her father's theory, Ed Brown's — perhaps everyone's theory about the rising generation — indeed, about anyone who wasn't yourself.

CHAPTER VI Observing the afternoon mail on the table beneath the mirror, Cicily picked up the letters in the hope of distraction. Her hope was fulfilled by the third one, tucked in among bills for the moving and settling for on its grey envelope she read, "Albert Lancaster, Esquire, Lilac Road, Lakewood, in Belle's slanting hand. She recognized it instantly and was suffused with curiosity as to what could be in it. On what possible subject could Belle be writing to Albert, with a telephone at her elbow? She had not long to wait as she stood by the mirror staring down at the letter for within five minutes she heard Albert's latchkey inserted in the door. She opened it, kissed him in the wash of cold air, and said immediately, "Albert there's a letter from Belle." "What does she say?" He was talking off his overcoat. "It's addressed to you." "To me?" He raised his fine eyebrows, then laughed a little. "What are you laughing at?" He pinched her cheek before he replied. "I was laughing at the thought that I'd better tell my girls to send their letters to the office. Though Miss Sadie would undoubtedly open them there." Miss Sadie was the elderly spinster, capable and benevolent, who had been installed by Ed Brown as Albert's stenographer. Cicily had thought that Miss Sadie, though the soul of respectability, was already perking up and taking a special interest in her handsome young employer. One morning she'd brought a single white carnation to the office to put in a vase on his desk; explaining that her brother-in-law was a funeral florist on Clark Street, near the entrance of Graceland. Albert had worn it home in his buttonhole that evening feeling, he'd said, as if he'd robbed a corpse. (To Be Continued)
