Film Features Top Radio Stars With Roy Rogers

The Wade Kidnap Case By Leslie Caryll

Felicite bit back an angry retort. How could the fellow be so gally matter of fact when her uncle had been placed in such a sorry plight.

"Sir Timothy Wade is quite well and in good spirits," he said, almost through sensing her thoughts. "Laudacious as it may sound, I do apologize for all the inconvenience occasioned. This has been my first serious essay in crime and it will be a relief to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. By the way, don't take my soft-heartedness too much for granted. I have a loaded automatic at hand which I should use without a qualm at the first sign of double-crossing."

Broome had been studying the man as closely as possible, trying to memorize his appearance and peculiarities. From his speech he was a person of some culture, probably with an army background. The square set of his shoulders, even while sitting, bore this out. A small scar on the back of his neck might be an old wound. For the rest he had greying hair, a moustache too luxuriant to be fashionable and bushy eyebrows to match. When he half turned his head the profile was clear cut and distinctive.

"Once he grins again there was the trick as of thought-reading. 'I'd be easy to identify again at some future time,' he said. 'Very easy without a fairly heavy disguise. But don't imagine that will come in useful. Our ultimate getaway has been carefully planned.'"

This might well be the case considering the way the affair had been managed throughout. Broome was already bewildered by the twists and turns made by the driver. Nor were the precautions yet complete. At another lonely spot another change of cars was made. This time they found themselves in more familiar company, that of the chauffeur who had presented himself at "Fairclough" and later concluded the fantastic chase ending near Guildford police station.

"You people seem to have an unlimited supply of cars," Broome commented drily. The fresh driver turned to wave at the departing saloon. "Second hand, and all cheap bargains," he said with a grin. "There's not much left when we dump the unwanted ones, or set fire to them out in the country. Not much to us, this. We work on big profits."

TO SLOW MUSIC

In his loosely cut sports jacket and flannel trousers, who at a dash cap pulled well down over his eyes, he looked considerably different from the neatly uniformed messenger of a few days previous. Yet the delivery had been authoritatively worn, suggesting that he was accustomed to being in such service.

Two large linen bags were thrust over to them. "What are they for?" Felicite asked, startled. "Nothing to get the wind up over, miss. Slip them over your heads. They'll seem a shade stuffy, but you'll soon get used to them. Better than blindingfog."

They came well down over the shoulders and effectively shut out what few signs of direction had been visible. As the man had said they were stuffy, although some thoughtfulfulness was apparent in the selection of two slits which could be manoeuvred close enough to mouth and nose to facilitate breathing.

"How long have we got to wear these?" Broome demanded, his voice muffled by the thick cloth. "Only about half an hour."

Presently they stopped long enough for some iron gates to be unlocked, the rattle of keys and the squeak of hinges being clearly heard. Broome's fingers tightened involuntarily, so that Felicite gave a slight gasp of pain. She thought it was intended to be reassuring, but actually the action had been one of surprise. It wasn't possible for a mere creaking gate to indicate their whereabouts, he thought. All hinges in need of oil made more or less the same kind of protesting noise. Still, there was something extremely familiar about the way it started as a deep note and worked up to a shrill whine.

MOORE & McLEOD Limited THE BOYS' SHOP

ROOMS ARE PREFERRED "Where is this confounded chief?" Broome asked irritably. "All in good time, mister. He'll be here in a minute. Sit down and make yourself comfortable."

"I've had enough sitting to last me a long time." "Suit yourself. It won't be for long." In spite of the assurance, about half-an-hour passed before a bell tinkled somewhere in the house. "Ready!" commanded their guide, leading the way down a short corridor and throwing open a door. "In-sic, please!"

Broome blinked at the contrasting brightness and turned to smile encouragingly at Felicite. As he did so, he became aware that this was indeed Marsh Hollow Manor. "Cosy place," remarked their captor. "No chance of being overheard if you make too much noise. And no inquisitive neighbours. Next door is three-quarters of a mile away."

"Can't we get our business done quickly and go home?" Broome inquired. "These precautions are all very well. But now you are about to receive the ransom, all that concerns us is to depart, taking Sir Timothy with us."

"Steady on, mister! — not so fast. There's a proper way of doing business." "Well, the cash is in that bag you are carrying. You've arranged it so we don't know where we are. The bargain was kept on my part. Now it is up to you to keep your word. Why keep us waiting?"
