Please accept full 10-day tube free. Note the great difference in the color of your teeth and gum firmness when dingy film is removed as dentists urge.

It keeps your smile unattractive because it absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. It invites tooth decay, gum troubles and pyorrhea because it breeds bacteria by the millions.

Now, in a new-type dentifrice called Pepsodent, a scientific combatant has been found. Leading dentists widely urge it. All druggists have it. Works wonders on dingy teeth. 10-day test sent free.

A Great Englishman

"TWENTY-FIVE YEARS BISHOP OF LONDON."

A book recently published by Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., Ltd., London, descriptive of the life and work of the Right Rev. Dr. Winington Ingram, should be read by every young minister of every Christian church and denomination, for the methods of the man who has been Bishop of London for twenty-five years is one that may well be followed and imitated.

Winington Ingram had many personal advantages. His father was a clergyman, and his mother was a daughter of the Bishop of Worcester. It is aptly remarked by Mr. Charles Herber, the writer of the volume under his name, that "the pre-natal factors in his nature made for the religious temperament." Nurtured in a Rectory, with all the good influences which environment and early training afford, he grew up alive to many facts in which other boys have no concern, and with a mind unconsciously affected by the priestly life of his father and the Episcopal life of his grandfather. He was the fourth son in a good, large, old-fashioned family. As the writer of the book remarks, "there is little chance for the growth of egotism in a family of ten." Educated first of all in the home and afterwards in Marlborough school, it does not appear that he was the winner of many school prizes. Afterwards he went to Keble College in Oxford. This college was, we are told, intended as a "school of simplicity," in which the opportunity of a frugal life for young men would show that the highest character is that of "the cultivated and religious man to whom wealth is a mere accident."

Young Ingram's residence in Oxford was not distinguished by any outstanding proficiency in scholarship or athletics. Nor was he particularly "religious." He took time, after his term at college was ended to consider whether or not he would take Holy Orders. Referring many years afterwards to the discussions that were held and the discord occasioned about the time he left college, Bishop Ingram said: "I should be the last to deny the importance of some of the controversies; but it is hard to realize now, trivial, how petty many of them must have seemed to the toiling millions of our fellow countrymen, or how, at any rate, far above their heads the 'burly-burly' sounded. There they were fighting and struggling for daily bread; here we were conversed with a question of whether a stole was legal. There they were working out their own salvation as best they might; here we were ranged into two rival camps of High Church and Low Church and too intent upon defeating one another to have time to attend to their growing hunger for a life which could be in any sense called real life—a home which was indeed a home."

After he left college, young Ingram spent three years on the continent, all the time thinking about his vocation in this life. Then he returned and was ordained Deacon in 1884. He at once became a curate of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, and was ordained priest at the end of the year. While at St. Mary's he was under the direction and influence of Bishop MacLagan who was then Bishop of Lichfield, and afterwards Archbishop of York. From the Bishop he imbibed that spirit of toleration for the views of other Christians which, with his gift of comradeship, has distinguished him as a Bishop.

His first promotion in the Church of England was to the Parish of Lichfield and to the position of private chaplain to Bishop MacLagan. Thence, after several years, he went to London and became Master of Oxford House, Bethnal Green, in East London. The aim of the founders of Oxford House was, on the one hand to learn something of the life of the poor and minister to their immediate needs, and on the other hand to try to better the conditions of the working classes in respect to health, recreation, mental culture and spiritual teaching; and, above all, to afford an example of simple religious life. Than Mr. Ingram no man could have been better fitted for this duty; and it was in the exercise of this duty that he developed the great qualities of mind and heart that have distinguished his Episcopacy.

Not unnaturally he was at first suspected of having an ulterior object in view, and the men of East London stared at him for some time. So he fell back upon the boys of the locality, founded clubs for them, gave them good ideas about play and to the rough and ready lovers of fighting he offered the inducement of boxing classes, and joined them in the ring, put on gloves with them, and in other ways gave them wholesome exercise and lots of fun. Presently there filtered into the minds of the older ones the truth that "Oxford House was not such a bad place after all," and gradually they came to know Mr. Ingram personally. He established clubs for the men as for the boys. Quite insensibly the prejudice against him broke down as these ordinary working men found themselves in touch with those who had possessed an advantage for which they and their children could not hope, and "yet put on no side about it." Men came and went. The men were included in the Sunday services, and their own accord. Great moral and spiritual benefits were obtained by them. Mr. Ingram kept the spiritual ideal constantly before them; and it is stated that he never did anything which surpassed, in the simplicity and beauty of its service, that which was accomplished in those years in which by means of commonplace routine he found his way into the hearts of the men and women, the boys and girls of Bethnal Green. The net result was that with perfect friendliness people of divergent creeds met together without in any way compromising their principles; and the idea which ruled among the working men, that if one is to be a Christian he must be prepared to swallow wholesales whatever he was taught was exploded.

From Oxford House, Mr. Ingram went to the incumbency of the Parish of Bethnal Green in East London. As incumbent he ministered to the poor in a still more influential way. He became popular as the man who saw to it that the houses of the poor were made comfortable by the landlords, that the water and the milk with which they were supplied were good and that they did not spend all their money in "drink." The landlords, water companies, milk vendors and licensees, antagonized, of course, but there had come a man to seek the welfare of Israel. To them the conduct of the "parson" seemed to be over-officious. But the majority of the common people were thankful and appreciative.

The activity and popularity of Mr. Ingram resulted in his promotion to the first vacancy on the staff of St. Paul's Cathedral, and he was made a Canon. As Canon of St. Paul's, a far larger circle of men and women came into touch with him. His sermons and Sunday afternoon lectures at the Cathedral drew congregations of thousands. But it was chiefly for his work in connection with the East London Church Fund that he became widely known. Soon he was again promoted to be the Suffragan Bishop of Stepney in the Diocese of London. In Stepney there were 318,000 families to be shepherded and for these there were 550 clergymen to be directed. The work as Bishop of Stepney was hard; for more workers were needed. He succeeded, however, in winning assistance from residents in the West End of London; and he obtained additional money with which to pay the salaries of additional clergymen. The crowning encouragement of all came on the 8th of March, 1901; for on that day he was nominated by the Prime Minister to the Bishopric of London. On the 25th of the same month and year the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral unanimously accepted the nomination and the election was publicly declared and confirmed on the 11th of April. He was then only forty-three years of age. Since then he has successfully administered his great diocese for a full quarter of a century.

In the course of the Great War the Bishop of London was at the front for many months together; and the British Field Marshal commanding reported that during the course of his visit "His Lordship was at the front every day; and, I think I am right in saying that there was scarcely a unit in the command which was not, at one time or other, present at his services."

The Bishop, owing to his previous visits to Canada, was known by many of the Canadian soldiers, and upon one occasion he addressed ten thousand of them from the balcony of a French town hall. It is recorded that as he left the balcony a staff officer turned to the Bishop's Chaplain and said, "That is a really great man."

"Probably," remarked the writer of the book under review, "this opinion was deepened by the sight of his life-guardsmen's height and princely presence; but it was chiefly occasioned by the simplicity and directness of his speech and the winning nature of his ways."

The Bishop of London, it has been announced, proposes to visit Canada again next month. There can be no doubt about the warmth of his reception by men and women of all classes and denominations. Meantime the volume here reviewed will be found interesting by all who may read it.

154,000 ACRES TOMATOES TO CAN.

New Jersey canneries are contracting for 20,000 acres of tomatoes this year, according to reports from 25 canneries in that state, which equals the 1925 acreage contracted. Taking the entire nation, however, it is found that only 154,000 acres are contracted for by the 518 canneries reporting, which is but 67 per cent of last year's 229,000 acres. Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware have all cut their demands sharply because of over production last year. The canned tomato is quite a staple market, and in the commercial trucking areas of these states is handled quite scientifically and efficiently by tractor, fertilizer distributor, transplanters, dusters, and sprayers, with motor truck transportation.
