HISTORY History in the great conception of it, has often been compared to a mountain chain seen far off in a clear sky, where the peaks seem linked to one another, towards the higher crest of the group. The unity of history is now orthodox doctrine, though accepted as orthodox doctrine sometimes are, in various senses. Acton put it that "History embraces ideas as much as events, and derives its best virtue from regions beyond the sphere of the State." A younger student, whose ability Acton recognized and highly valued, puts it a little more fully: "No presentation of history can be adequate which neglects the growths of the religious consciousness, of literature, of the moral and physical science, of art, of scholarship, of social life." Lord Morley.
