JAPANESE CAVALRY CHARGE UNDER FIERCE FIRE.
The Jap cavalryman is, after all, only a foot soldier on horseback. He lacks the natural dash of the Cossack, the Dragon or the European horseman. Yet the Jap cavalry have done good service, and at least has seldom failed to reach a point desired when the order "charge" has run along the line. The little Japanese horses are sadly inferior to the big beasts used by the Cossacks, and when these two forces have been opposed without artillery interference the Cossack has invariably won. The present drawing is of a dashing charge made weeks ago against Russian guns situated at the base of Nanshan Hill.

The fighting still continues.

FIERCE FIGHTING NEAR MUKDEN.

MUKDEN, Nov. 27.—(Special)—The Japanese on Friday made a fierce attack on the Russian left front.
This fighting was fierce, almost amounting to a bayonet engagement.
THE ATTACK RENEWED.
The Japs were everywhere repulsed and suffered severely.
Early the following morning the attack was renewed, the Japs having received reinforcements, but they were again repulsed.

FIGHTING IN A BLIZZARD.

In the afternoon of Saturday a blizzard and fog greatly hindered the artillery fire. The Japs continued to advance under cover of the fog, but the Russians held their positions and the fire gradually slackened.

THE BATTLE GOING ON.

Later the Japs resumed the offensive and endeavored to envelop the Russian left flank whilst advancing against the centre.
No later reports were received.
