The Old Order Changes

They relapsed into silence again, each busy with her own thoughts. Bee's were centered on Hugh Evans, and she was privately concocting a diplomatic note which might lead to anything. In view of their possible and early transition to a higher sphere Mrs. Freeland had put her veto, in the month of June, on the local tennis club, where the girls had all sorts of people. "It's too mixed, my dears," she said, citing several names to prove her case. "It is easier to make undesirable acquaintances than to drop them. You needn't drop it suddenly or drastically, but I certainly won't have you go twice or thrice a week unwillingly than Mary, who was often too tired after a long, hot day in school, and the ride to and fro, and also had home-work to superintend. Both, however, loved tennis, and Bee was a first-class player.

"Mother, couldn't we go to the sea somewhere, next month?" asked Bee. "Scarborough would be very nice," she added innocently. She was fully aware that Hugh Evans and his sister Gladys, who kept house for him, had taken rooms at the Majestic as far back as May, but she was far too wise to drop a hint of that.

"One thing at a time, if you please," her mother said with dignity; nevertheless the seed did not fall on stony ground. So in brief and spasmodic efforts at conversation they came, in due course, to the pretty village, drew up at the inn, even as Tom had done that morning, and made inquiry for the house of Mrs. Coles.

Be sure such an event did not pass unheeded, and set the tongue of gossip wagging. Mrs. Freeland took no thought of that. Born and reared in a rather busy provincial town, she was ignorant of the close ways and wool of life in a village. Bee remarked on the beauty of the cottage gardens, but her mother did not heed her. As they neared the gate in question, Mrs. Freeland suddenly turned to Bee:

"Dear—I think you'd better not come in just at first. There might be a scene, and anyhow, some things will have to be said, some questions will frankly put, and I prefer you should not be there. Just take a walk to the edge of the common—it looks like a common doesn't it—and in a few minutes I'll come to the gate and call you, if necessary." Bee did not demur. Perhaps, in her secret heart, she was glad. She was a flirt and a coquette because circumstances had made her so. She was much sought after by young men who preferred her gay chatter and bright eyes to Mary's more solid qualities. But she had no unhealthy curiosity regarding forbidden subjects. Her mind and heart were crystal-clear, she had the gay, fearless purity of a child, which, no doubt, created an aura about her, adding considerably to her attraction. She walked on past the gate guarded by the royal blaze of hollyhocks, and did not once look back. Mrs. Freeland pushed the gate open and walked, with a step that lagged surprisingly, towards the open door.

When Your Cough Hangs On, Mix This at Home

The best cough remedy that money could buy, can easily be mixed at home. It saves money and gives you the most reliable, quick-acting medicine you ever used. The way it takes hold of stubborn coughs and chest colds, giving immediate relief, is astonishing. Any druggist can supply you with 2 1/2 ounces of Pinex. Pour this into a 10 oz. bottle, and fill up with plain granulated sugar syrup or strained honey. It's no trouble at all to mix, and when you once use it, you will never be without it. Keeps perfectly and tastes good—children really like it. It is surprising how quickly this loosens the germ-laden phlegm, and soothes and heals the inflamed membranes. At the same time, part of the medicine is absorbed into the blood, where it acts directly on the bronchial tubes, and helps the system throw off the whole trouble. Even those severe coughs which follow cold epidemics, are promptly ended. Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway Pine, containing the active agent of creosote, in a refined, palatable form. Nothing known in medicine is more helpful in cases of severe coughs, chest colds and bronchial troubles. Do not accept a substitute for Pinex. It is guaranteed to give prompt relief or money refunded.

She felt extraordinarily nervous, even agitated, and all the fine words and phrases she had been marshalling for the confusion of the common girl who had presumed to entangle her son, somehow began to get very mixed, and, finally, to recede away. She found that, after all, she had no preparation for one of the biggest events of her life. She heartily wished herself anywhere else, and blamed her own precipitate haste in coming to Tatton-cum-Regis. The sharp bark of a little dog broke the stillness even before she tapped at the door. A little passage of red brick, scrubbed very cleanly and having the warm tone of age on it disclosed the simplicity of the house. She knocked lightly, and presently heard a noise in the place to the right of the door which was the kitchen. Then a step, and the girl she had come to seek stood before her.

Just now and again in this sad old world miracles happen for which there is no precedent preparation or explanation. The girl, with the bobbed hair, looking so pitifully young and girlish, yet with the slightly sharpened features and the hollow eyes which told their tale, started back almost in affright at sight of the well-dressed lady on the step.

She had hardly yet recovered from the excitement of the morning, and some spasm seemed to seize her so that she put out her hand to steady herself against the lintel. Now, somewhere below the encrustations of pride and ambition, Mrs. Freeland had a mother's heart. It is a mighty power that has its habitation there, a power that has been known to come in conflict with, and ultimately confound, a throne. "Oh, oh!" said Edie. "Don't be angry! I'm afraid!"

It was a piteous appeal. There was no question, because she knew that it was Tom's mother, the final court of appeal for them both, the real arbiter of their destiny. For Tom had told her so in his frantic attempts to grapple with the consequences of his own weakness, sin, and lack of moral courage. Mrs. Freeland, with a natural impulse, put out her arm to steady the girl, had it about her shoulders before she knew where she was, and so led her into the sitting-room, and the door was shut.

Not so, had she prearranged it; she had pictured the dignity with which she would meet and arraign this disturber of the family peace. Edie did not cry; she stood a forlorn and rather appealing figure by the table her hand almost touching the glass-covered case of wax fruit which was her aunt's priceless heirloom. "Don't be angry! Don't say all the things Tom said you would say!" she faltered. "I know I've done wrong. I hate myself—I wish I was dead. And if—and if you think it is going to stand in Tom's way—marrying me—I'll go away to the colonies, or some-where, and earn my own living. I done it before and I can again. I won't push myself into no family that's goin' to hate me, and do me in."

Mrs. Freeland started back in horror at this strange suggestion. "I'm a pore gel," went on Edie bravely. "But I ain't a worm—I got me own pride, too, same as you have. 'I'm not blamin' Tom nor pretendin' it wasn't my fault too. We oughta got married when we met first, that's what we ought to 'ave done. I didn't think about it, and I'm not pushing for it now. I'm not one o' them that's for ever thinkin' on what they can get outa man. A gel needn't these days. She can always earn good money and keep 'erself respectable, if she likes. That's my story, Mrs. Freeland. I'm not crawlin' on my 'ands and knees to be took up by you."

She did not speak sullenly nor yet defiantly, but quite simply and bravely, and her words, therefore, ang true and sank deep. They took the wind completely out of Mrs. Freeland's sails, and while nothing could banish the poignancy of her grief over it all, still that grief began to be rimmed with hope. Out of this good stuff, this plucky owning to a fault and standing up by the consequences, something might be made.

NEWSY NOTES BY AGRICOLA

Jupiter et al. Like Bunyan's "man with the muck-rake" we do not turn our eyes upward as we should, and thereby miss many things which would make far greater interest in our lives. Those who are occasional star-gazers will find the stary firmament very attractive just now. Between 9 and 10 p. m., the constellation Orion—one of the most splendid of the star-groups—is adorning the southern heavens. It is easily recognized by its three stars in an oblique line, forming the belt of the figure, the "bands" of the Book of Job. Hanging from the belt is a stripe of stars known as the sword one of which—easily seen in a small telescope—is the famous Fish-mouth Nebula in Orion. Passing a little eastward, the eye encounters Sirius, the "Dog-star," a magnificent orb of a bright greenish color, whose brilliance, the astronomers say, exceeds that of our sun thirty-fold. Further eastward, but high in the heavens, shines Jupiter one of our own solar family. He is brighter to the eye at present than Sirius and easily outshines any star visible now. Continuing in the same direction, we notice lower down, a star less bright and of a faint red-dish tinge. This is Mars, who comes into opposition on the 27th of the month, that is, we shall be directly between that planet and the sun. Two other notable stars are in the vicinity though not visible to the unassisted eye, the planetoid Eros which is northward of Mars, and the outermost member of the Solar system, the lately discovered planet Pluto.

Mars is our nearest neighbor in a general way, but Eros sometimes comes nearer, within about fifteen million miles. As Pluto is a very recent discovery, not much is known of that planet as yet.

The following may be helpful in enabling my readers to "spot" the principal planets. They give a steady light whereas the fixed stars twinkle. If very bright the planet is either Venus or Jupiter. If it be in the south it is Jupiter, for Venus is seen only in the east or west. If it be a pale star, it is Saturn; but if it be slightly ruddy in its appearance, it is Mars. The last are about as bright as the brightest of the fixed stars, but Venus and Jupiter exceed this.

I know of no poet more adapted for children's reading than Longfellow. When I was nine or ten years old, I delighted to read his works. But I formed a wrong idea from his reference to "the red planet Mars." I had expected to see a star glowing like the tail light of an automobile, but was disappointed to find that the ruddiness was very slight. Was this merely a coincidence? On the night of the 4th inst., the moon was in close proximity to Jupiter, and I pointed this out to a relative, saying jocularly "what say to a good storm in a couple of days time?"—as if we could, now arrange for such an event. Sure enough on the 6th, the barometer fell about an inch and a half, with strong winds and very dirty weather. It was most likely worse in other places for we only get the "tail-end" of such disturbances here.
