Feather in Her Hat

By JULIE ANNE MOORE

CHAPTER 14

Thousands of telegrams and letters poured into the hospital during Lee's first week there, but telegrams from his mother alone were sufficient to keep him occupied much of each morning. Her physician had forbidden her to cross the continent unless it was a case of life and death, and being impatient with even air mail, she wrote endless "letters" on the telegraph blanks.

It was during his sixth week in the hospital that his mother walked into his room one evening and after a minimum of affectionate exchanges, demanded to know, "Who is this little government clerk on the question left in Lee on the mind that she had 'had information,' as she phrased it, and had promptly told her doctor to go to the devil and caught the next plane East."

"I won't have any of this nonsense, Lee," she told him as she paced the floor at the foot of the bed. "It is evident this girl planned that wreck in the mountains and then proceeded to rope you in. . . I gave you credit for better sense."

Lee made no effort to conceal his amusement. "You would not have known this girl if you had not seen her in the world! . . . I know her kind. I want to see this little adventurer and tell her I'll fight her with every cent I own. If she's reasonable, I'll have my lawyers draw up a settlement. If she isn't, I'll have her arrested."

"At you. At the idea of your talking about a 'settlement' with Ann. What I wouldn't give for a ringside seat for that little comedy!"

"It will not, I think, be a comedy," she suddenly sank into a chair. "When will you get out of here, Lee?"

read it after her return to Washington. "Yes," she said. "I thought it very good, but a good deal overrated. The author apparently wanted to convey the idea that Miriam was typical of her generation."

"You think she was not?" Ann smiled. "Miriam was about my age," she said. "Of all the girls I know, I can think of but one who would put material considerations before love. Miriam was what they are now calling a gold-digger. She had no regard for convention, or even simple decency. To her marriage was merely a means to an end. And when she did finally marry the man who knew nothing of her past, it was his money that gave her social prestige that she wanted."

"I'm afraid," said Mrs. Monday, "you do not know your generation. Have you ever lived in New York?" "I've never lived in any city but Washington—and only a short time here."

"I guessed as much. Anyone can look at you and see that you haven't been contaminated by contact with unwholesome influences. But when you speak for your generation, my child, you unintentionally pretend a knowledge you could not possibly possess. 'Girls in Mink' was admirably true to life and your Miriam was, I regret to say, the counterpart of an alarming number of girls of your age. You think, perhaps I am too far removed from your age to know, but I have just come from California to deal with a girl of Miriam's type—a gold-digger, as you say—a shrewd, scheming little fellow who had her head on her shoulders. You think, perhaps I am too far removed from your age to know, but I have just come from California to deal with a girl of Miriam's type—a gold-digger, as you say—a shrewd, scheming little fellow who had her head on her shoulders."

"Mrs. Monday shrugged, impatiently. "Naturally not—though I haven't talked with her. I hope to see her within the next twenty-four hours and make her a very generous offer."

"An offer," Ann said puzzled. "Money, child. That's what she wants, isn't it?"

Ann gripped the sides of the chair and gazed down at her extended hand thoughtfully. After a time she looked up and said, "I think you're being quite fair," she said.

Face and Hands Were Swollen

New Normal Again Thanks to Dodd's

"I suffered eight years with a sore back," writes Mrs. Pierce E. Marcher, of Red Bank, N.B. "My face, hands and feet were swollen. A friend told me about Dodd's Kidney Pills. I got two boxes and tried them and I felt so much better that I kept on taking them. I took nine boxes and am perfectly relieved, thanks a thousand times to Dodd's Kidney Pills. They are the only relief I could get."

PLAYED ON THE ORGAN

"It's curious," said Brown to his club friends, "how coming events cast their shadows before them. I've wagered a fiver that none of you fellows can guess what was the last thing played on the church organ before the fire destroyed it."

"The 'Lost Chord,'" suggested Smith. Brown shook his head. "Tosti's 'Good-bye,'" said the local baritone. Brown shook his head again.

"What was it?" asked another member impatiently. Brown got up, reached for his hat, and went to the door. Then he replied, "The fire hose."

Void In Space Now Held Impossible

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Oct. 18.—Powerful telescopes at Mt. Wilson Observatory, in Pasadena, Calif., together with a study of the region of space which that telescope now observe, show that the making-up of the universe is homogeneous in all directions, and that there is no indication of a super-system of nebulae. Announcement of this was made at Yale University yesterday by Dr. Edwin P. Hubble, noted astronomer of the Mt. Wilson Observatory.

In the corridor they halted. Lee's room was to the right, the stairs and elevator to the left. Ann's face was a study of indecision as she stood there. When she spoke, her voice was low and husky.

"The old woman's eyes widened, but after a moment she said, 'Yes, I am Lee's mother. You are a friend of his?'"

"And did not answer the question. 'Will you give him this, please?'"

Two hours later Rita found Ann in her usual place at the Census office, but she would not discuss what she had done. "If our friendship means anything," she said, "let me work this thing out alone. Ann, don't please bring me messages from anyone."

She chose an unfortunate moment to return, for she found not only Rita and Mollie there, but also Selma and Carl and Bill Hudson. They all gave her a noisy welcome and teased her unmercifully for her "attack of temperance," as Bill called it. But through all the banter there was an undertone of something unpleasant, some uneasiness. It was Mollie who finally told her.

Alure Not Only Thing in Choosing Mate Dorothy Dix Says Clinging Vines Do Not Make Good Wives

If Men Want Happiness in Marriage They Should Select Women Who Have Some Sense in Their Heads

One of the things that makes marriage such an unpredictable adventure is the fact that the very qualities that allure us into marriage with a man or woman are so often the very ones that prove unendurable to live with and send us to the divorce court.

Take helplessness, for instance. Before marriage there is nothing so appealing to a man in a woman as helplessness. That is why the clinging vine always finds a support. There is something in the spectacle of a woman who doesn't know what it is all about, and who just sits down and wrings her hands when she encounters any of the practical problems of life that brings out all the chivalry in his nature and that makes him feel that it would be just simply heavenly to spend the remainder of his life taking care of the poor little darling and protecting her from all the hardships of a cruel world.

But after marriage helplessness does not appear to the man to be the cardinal feminine virtue. It seems about the worst vice. For the husband finds that his clinging vine is not a flowery wreath about his neck. She is a millstone. And when he has to do his wife's work as well as his own, and put up with sloppy housekeeping and wastefulness and extravagance because he is married to a woman who never learns how to cook or run a budget, he wonders what the fool-killer was doing that it didn't get him on the day he picked out a helpless wife.

Then there are the beautiful but dumb. Peaches-and-cream complexions and golden looks, but absolutely nothing under the wolverines. Never read a book in their lives. Think that the League of Nations has something to do with Babe Ruth, but are not quite certain even about that. Conversational range that runs from "he said" to "she said" and "they said."

Thousands upon thousands of intelligent, highly educated men marry these feminine morons just because they are easy on the eyes. They think they will be content to look at a living picture all their lives, and that it is cute to have a wife who rolls her eyes at you and what you think she thinks. But the living picture turns into a chromo after a few years and a cultured man gets tired of talking to a wife who has to have everything explained to her in words of one syllable, and who never knows what he is talking about when he tells a good story, or discusses now play or the political situation. Many a poor, bored husband discovers that what was charming artlessness at 18 is nothing but dull stupidity at 40.

Then there is sensitiveness. Many men are fascinated by the highly strung, neurotic, emotional girl who goes to pieces over everything and bursts into tears at the slightest provocation. They feel that she is something rare, fragile, delicate, different from the ordinary millium of commonplace women and they have the same yen for her they might have for some exotic fit of costly bric-a-brac for which they had no need, and which they wouldn't know what to do with after they got it.

But, la-la, after marriage the man who is married to a sensitive woman and that he is doomed to spend the remainder of his life walking on eggs for his wife keeps her precious feelings spread all over the place and, as agile as he may, he can never keep from stepping on some of them. Also he finds out that while it was thrilling to comfort a pretty girl who was weeping on the third button of his best, there is mighty little kick in having to deal with a wife who is a chronic weeper, and who is always pickled in brine about something or other that has gone wrong. Likewise, it is borne in upon him that sensitiveness is an alibi for temper and selfishness, and that every time he asserts a few natural rights he has to give in, or else be drowned in salt water.

Of course, there are lots of other good qualities in women that look good before marriage and not so good afterward. Beautiful dressing and grooming, for instance, that are not so enticing when you have to pay the bill. Vivacity when you would like to stay at home and read a new book instead of stepping out every evening to places of amusement. Domesticity after you have got fed up on a wife who smells of bread and butter and who has no interest outside of her own home. And so on and so on.

INDUSTRIAL HOMEWORK IN U.S. CONDEMNED

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18.—A sweeping condemnation of industrial homework was voiced today by the women's bureau of the United States Labor Department which estimated that such 'labo' is carried on in at least 77,000 homes "where poverty prevents the development of any bargaining power."

Regulation of homework "has been mainly for the purpose of safeguarding the consumer rather than of protecting the homeworkers," the bureau said in urging abolishment of this form of industry.

THE COOK'S CORNER

COCOANUT COOKIES

Blend 1/2 cup shortening with 1/2 cup granulated sugar and 1/2 cup brown sugar. Add 1 egg, unbeaten. Then add 1/2 cup flour sifted with 1/2 teaspoon baking powder and 1/2 teaspoon soda and 1/2 teaspoon salt. Next add 1 cup shredded cocoanut (chopped) and 1 cup quick cooking oatmeal, and a few drops vanilla. Bake 8 minutes at 350 degrees Fahr. This recipe makes 40 small cookies.

GOLDEN ANGEL FOOD

Beat until very light the yolks of 4 eggs and 1 tablespoon cold water. Add gradually 1 1/2 cups sugar and beat until smooth. Beat in 1-3 cup hot water and then add 1 1/2 cups flour sifted with 1 1/2 teaspoons baking powder and a pinch of salt. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Lastly, beat the whites of the eggs until frothy, add 1/2 teaspoon cream of tartar, and beat until stiff. Fold them into the egg and flour mixture, and bake in a tube pan for one hour or more in a slow oven (325 degrees F.) When done, invert the pan until the cake is cool. This is a deliciously light and tender cake.

die cut, and when they have been wiped clean, brush them well with salad oil. To prevent the flesh from drying, it is a good idea to wrap it in well oiled or buttered grassproof paper, or cooking parchment. Then cook it under a grill or in a hot oven.

Salmon steaks require twelve to fifteen minutes cooking, and should be turned frequently if they are grilled. A pat of butter or margarine should be put on to any grilled food while it is still hot, so that it melts and forms a sauce.

BEST WAY TO CAN CHICKEN TO KEEP FLAVORS

Poultry should be canned in pint of quart jars or in No. 2 or No. 3 plain tin cans. Process at 15 pounds of pressure; pint, 55 minutes; quart, 60 minutes; No. 2, 55 minutes; No. 3, 60 minutes.

Preparation

Draw the dressed chicken as for cooking. Remove the lungs. Scrub the skin with a brush and lukewarm suds, using an odorless soap. Rinse thoroughly under running water. Cut the skin between the legs and body, remove the whole legs, and split them at the joint. Cut off the wings and chop off their tips. Remove the oil sac.

Begin at the breast, cut down around the back and to the neck. Keep all in one piece. Remove the neck. Although the chicken may be cooked before canning if desired it is unnecessary. Such pre-cooking is a time-consuming process, the flavor resulting from it seems less desirable to most people, and it cannot decrease the time of processing.

PACKING

Arrange all pieces so that the skin, and not the flesh, touches the container. Put in the drumstick, a fleshy part downward. Place the thigh next to it. Place the two wings next to the thigh, fitting the elbow of one wing into the other. If the liver and gizzard and heart are sweet, as they should be, wrap them in a piece of neck skin and place them in the bottom of the jar, gizzard first.

If several chickens are being canned at one time, these parts may be canned separately if desired. Allow 1 1/2 teaspoons of salt for a quart of canned chicken. Add half of the salt at this point. Place the neck, rib-end down, in the center of the can and fit the remaining pieces in to the best advantage.

Cut the non-bony pieces in such a way that there is a piece of skin for each piece of flesh. It is preferable to have a dark piece covered with skin on top of the pack, as this meat is naturally more juicy than the white meat and the piece in this position sometimes becomes slightly dry.
