In a mixed population people of different tribal instincts, people for centuries have been influenced by widely different physical surroundings, who for centuries have grown and developed in entirely different political, social and moral atmospheres. And the tremendous natural task which Canada is facing today is melting the mold, the fusing of this heterogeneous mass of humanity into a solid body of citizenship, having a national Canadian soul. We have to do with older nations has been the natural growth and development of centuries.

In my opinion this great task must be, if it is accomplished through the quiet persistent moulding, leavening influence of what might be termed the dominant types of our citizens. When I say dominant, I am speaking somewhat in terms of Mendelism. I submit that one of those dominant types is the Scot. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I speak of the Scot as being one, not the only dominant type, and what I may say in praise or laudation of the qualities of that race is not intended to derogate in any way from the splendid natural characteristics of our citizens of English, Irish or French extraction. I shall not attempt to deal with this subject by dealing with individual examples. You all know that the sons of Scotland in this land of their adoption, have stood and still stand in the forefront of every profession and calling. Individually they have taken and performed their full share in the great task of nation-building. But that is not in line of argument. The point I desire to make is that the Scot through his original tribal or racial instincts developed by ages of environment possesses natural characteristics which make him a dominant factor socially and nationally, and the spread of which will make for national safety and stability in Canada.

The original inhabitants of Scotland were Celts. Early in its history, however, the southern part of the country, or what is known as the Lowlands, was settled by Anglo-Saxons. So far as heredity, then, is concerned, we find the Scot descended from the two races and the respective racial characteristics have persisted in the Highlander and the Lowlander down to the present day. In the Highlander we still have the man of vision and imagination, always living on the borders of the land of dreams and spirits. (I do not mean liquid spirits) full of hospitality, which he lavished with the airs and manners of a king and a hero of so many stories of the type of "Bang goes saxeption," and his aptitude for and ability in mechanics, which have carried them so far in the success of engineering and construction. I have already said that some nations have become great in spite of the lack of natural resources of their country. This is eminently true of Scotland. In fact, one might go much further and say with truth that the Scot became great because of the natural poverty and barrenness of his country. Here, in the lowlands, the survival of the fittest operated. Here, if anywhere the battle was to the strong, and the battle was to wrest an existence from a wild barren, rocky and forbidding country, and sometimes they found it easier to wrest it from the extravagance of the South. But nature was not the only enemy of these people. They were never free from attack by their neighbors. Very early in their history they were subject to attacks and invasions from Ireland. But their greatest and most formidable enemy was England. In fact, up to the fourteenth century the South of Scotland and almost as far north as Edinburgh, was almost continually in a state of devastation on account of ravages by English armies. It was in this environment, then, in the early centuries of Scottish national characteristics grew and were developed. This period was followed by one of internal strife and dissent, at times breaking out into open civil war with the nobles on one side and the sovereign and the church on the other. They followed the turmoil and strife and persecution of the reformation. Under such circumstances can it be wondered at up almost to the end of the seventeenth century, Scotland intellectually, socially and commercially had made but little progress. From that time onward, however, her progress was unequalled. She has supplied some of the most illustrious statesmen of the empire and some of the greatest Lord Chancellors of England.

We ask what were the qualities, the national characteristics developed through these early centuries of darkness and struggle and strain and which ultimately bore fruit in this wonderful intellectual, social and industrial growth and advancement. May I be permitted to suggest some of them? First, I would name courage and steadfastness of purpose. Good there have been a better, a more thorough training school for these virtues? Even nature seemed to be the enemy of man and was always arrayed against him. A country of mountains and glens of black and barren hillsides, of lowering skies, of foaming torrents, a country in which an existence could only be maintained by the greatest and most sustained struggle. Added to that continuous danger from attack by human enemies, and you have a combination of conditions where the exercise of the greatest courage was necessary to human existence. And what I have said regarding the necessity for courage, applies equally to the exercise of that other virtue I have mentioned namely, steadfastness of purpose. I would first suggest thrift and frugality. There a people are compelled generation after generation to make the greatest struggle for the barest physical existence, habits of thrift and frugality are bound to develop. But perhaps I had better not pursue this phase of the subject lest it might induce some evil-minded person after I have finished, to relate some story of the expense of my Lowland friends. May I suggest as another characteristic—Love of liberty. I do not think I need argue that this is a virtue. We all boast and I think justly that within the British Commonwealth of Nations, the people enjoy a greater measure of true liberty than in any other country at any time. The history of Scotland, as I have already briefly referred to it, is the history of the continuous persistent struggle for liberty—a continuous assertion by the people of their rights, and their final triumph and vindication. I do not know that history furnishes a parallel of the treatment accorded by the people to their sovereigns. They put to death James I, and James III. They rebelled against James II and James VII. They kept James V. in confinement. They imprisoned and deposed Mary. They imprisoned James VI, and led him captive through the country. They surrendered Charles I to his English enemies. All this is evidence that even the sovereign did not escape when he attempted to interfere with the liberty of the people. I shall content myself with suggesting one other national characteristic. — Family loyalty and discipline. This characteristic was developed and fostered by the clan system. The law was really a large family of which the Chief was the head or patriarch. The members of the clan were connected by blood or marriage and they owed and practised the strictest loyalty and obedience to their Chief. His commands were never questioned and he was held in the greatest affection by every member of the clan, and the same loyalty was practised between members of the clan. There were, of course, continual feuds and quarrels between clans, and complete loyalty within the clan was necessary to self-preservation. And this same spirit early developed by the clan system was subsequently reflected and perpetuated in the family life of Scotland. Nowhere will we find greater loyalty and obedience within the family circle than among the Scottish people. I shall not within the compass of this paper attempt to enumerate other Scottish characteristics. That the above have been developed and are still apparent, I take it requires no further argument.

I think it will be generally admitted that they were strongly developed in the early Scottish emigrants to Canada, and perhaps especially in the Maritime Provinces, and their influence upon the moulding of the Canadian national life and character up to the present is difficult indeed to estimate. I do not think it will be questioned that the maintenance and development of the virtues I have named is vitally necessary to a high standard of Canadian citizenship. Facing as we are, the rapidly growing complexity and difficulty of national industrial and social problems, inseparable from a rapidly increasing mixed population over a vast area, who will not admit that courage and steadfastness of purpose are not needed? To my mind, considering the ever multiplying means of civilization advances, together with the great potential natural wealth of our country, waiting for exploitation, one of our most menacing dangers is from extravagance and waste, not only through direct loss but on account of its enervating effects upon our people. Why, then, should we not take a leaf from the book of our neighbor, the Lowlander?

We are perhaps prone to think that we have reached that stage of civilization where we have as much liberty as is good for us. But the menace to true liberty does not always come from the sovereign, the ruling classes, the law-makers, or even the church. True liberty includes a proper adjustment of the political economic and social relationship between and among all classes of citizens and in this age of ever increasing complexity of these relationships there is always danger and need of watchfulness on the part of true lovers of liberty. I do not think that anyone of my voice will for a moment question that next to our Christian Religion there is no institution to which the British Empire owes so much as to the home. I shall not insult your intelligence by offering any argument in support of that proposition. The importance of the home as a national institution, national safeguard, is as great as ever it was. And in my opinion the menace to that institution was never as great as today. The menace comes from the ever increasing and multiplying number of outside pleasures and amusements on the one hand and the ever increasing demands of business and affairs upon our time and attention on the other.

I have not the time to deal with this phase of my subject as its great importance demands, but I do feel that if we continue to follow our present pernicious habit of spending in our homes only that part of our time which we cannot spend pleasurable elsewhere, if we allow other matters of public and private business to exclude from our thoughts and attentions all consideration of our home duties and responsibilities, then our dream of Canada's future will be but a nightmare, that this civilization of which we are wont to boast, will go the way of those of ancient days.

In conclusion, may I again remind you of our great, our wonderful heritage, and may I remind you still more emphatically of the greater duties and responsibilities which accompany it. We as citizens shall not fail in the full performance of these responsibilities if we ever keep in mind and endeavor to emulate these outstanding virtues, which our forefathers brought here with them, a heritage of the ages, and which they planted in the soil of this new land, a firm and enduring foundation of Canadian citizenship.
