

Cheap Power for Development

For new development work, where cheap power is required without a large capital investment, Diesel Engines make an ideal installation. The investment is comparatively small, the cost of operating is low, and the fuel is easily transported. Many Canadian industries that are not situated close to hydro-electric plants are now using Fairbanks-Morse Diesel Engines with satisfactory results. The Premier Gold Mines are now using over 2,000 h.p., the railway companies use them for their pumping stations, towns and cities rely upon them for pumping and lighting. In fact, Diesel Engines are rapidly coming to the fore as one of the most economical sources of power.

Fairbanks-Morse Diesel Engines are made in sizes for 10 to 25 h.p., horizontal, and 30 to 840 h.p., vertical.

"Jealous Hearts"

By MILDRED BARBOUR

Continued

THE YIELDING

The long afternoon hours dragged by, and still Millicent sat by the window in her room. In her hand she held, unopened, the letter Elinor had written to Tony.

Dark storm-clouds had risen out of the west and crept across the smiling sky, shutting out the sunlight that had warmed and brightened the morning. The wind moaned through the poplars, scattering their silver leaves. In the garden, the autumn flowers drooped and swayed, as though in fear of the approaching winter.

And the storm in Millicent's soul was blacker, more violent, more terrible. She knew that she was going to open the letter, although it was not meant for her eyes—the letter she had stolen.

A great nature, she told herself, might have resisted the temptation successfully. But hers was not a great nature. Hers was a nature, trustful and happy, that had suddenly been pierced through and through by the venomous, bitter shafts of jealousy.

She must know whether her husband and her foster-sister were in love with each other.

Very slowly, with stiff, cold fingers, she opened the envelope. Her breath came unevenly, and her cheeks were flushed. She had a feeling that some one must be looking on, watching her in her guilt.

"In a moment now," she told herself, "I shall be either the happiest girl in the world, or the most wretched."

She unfolded the letter, opened the first sheet, and read, in Elinor's absurd scrawl:

"Well, old thing, here I am at last!"

Millicent caught her breath.

Hardly an ardent start for a love-letter!

"The great career is about to begin," Elinor's letter went on. "I'm going to show you what I can do. I know you never believed in me very much. (Oh, no, you didn't, even though you were too polite to say so outright.) But some day I'll make you apologize to me for your mean thoughts—some day, or some night, rather, when you're paying several hundred dollars to hear me sing at the Metropolitan. It's a long road, but I'll get there. You'll see!"

Millicent's hands ceased to tremble. Her cheeks no longer were flushed, and her breathing became regular. A great thankfulness was flooding her soul.

She read to the end of the brief letter. It was all in the same vein, all about Elinor herself, her thoughts and ambitions. She made no mention of Danell, beyond the flat, unembroidered statement that she'd got hold of an excellent leaguer "for a song—and that's no pun, either."

Millicent wondered just what she meant by that, but she was, nevertheless, immensely relieved that Elinor had not elaborated the Danell theme for Tony's benefit. Surely that could only mean that she had no desire to arouse jealousy in him.

But later, thinking it over, it occurred to Millicent that Elinor's very omission might be significant. If there were something more than an old friendship between Tony and Elinor, she might be loath to tell him that another man was usurping his place in her affections.

"Oh, why do I have to think of so many horrid things that might be possible, just when I'm beginning to breathe easily again?" moaned Millicent.

The rest of the letter, however, was thoroughly reassuring. Elinor wrote: "You and Millicent must run up to New York to see me some time. She will enjoy the shops and theatres, after hibernating in your dreary ancestral manor. Oh, it's lovely enough there, Tony, but how I used to hate the winters in the country, and how thankful I am to get away from it all!"

"Must run now. Voice lesson. Temperamental master. The hard-working pupil. Will write sometime again—maybe."

"Yours, Elinor."

Not "your," but "yours!" Millicent studied the little word carefully. There was no doubt, even in Elinor's scrawl, that there an "s" at the end of the word.

Millicent folded the letter, replaced it in the envelope, and then, resting her arms on the window-ledge, hid her head and wept long and stormily in sheer relief. The strain had been too long and too great, the atmosphere too surcharged with suppressed emotion. When the storm broke, it was thorough, and it cleared away the dark, fearsome clouds in her soul.

She had been mistaken after all! Her heart seemed to sing the words over and over. That kiss in the garden had meant nothing. There was no secret love between Elinor and Tony! Not when she could write him such a letter!

When Millicent lifted her head from her arms and laughed aloud from sheer happiness, even while she wiped away the tears that still coursed down her cheeks, she became aware that the storm outside had broken, too. Sheets of water were being swept by the wind across the garden, almost obscuring it. The rain poured down the window-pane and the window-casements rattled under the onslaught of the gale. The whole world seemed to be a chaos of darkness and thunderous waters.

All but Millicent's heart, which was singing.

She was bathing her eyes when one of the maids knocked and announced that "Mistah Tony" was down-stairs and wished to see her at once, if possible.

"He came in this storm?" she cried aghast.

"Yas'm," grinned the maid. "He's right wet."

Millicent made a hasty toilet. All trace of tears was gone, and she was her radiant self again—the radiant bride of a few months ago—when she descended the old colonial stairs.

Tony was waiting at the foot, his face white and grim, his lips curiously tight. She grew pale with apprehension.
