Before leaving for service overseas five Calgary soldiers each Bunny Ward, recently received a bought a victory bond and donated letter 117 feet long. It was made up their blood to the Red Cross Blood of a number of individual letters Donor's Clinic. from friends, pasted together.

WAR has meant added duties for Canada's Chartered Banks, too

Over and above their regular peacetime services, the banks have assumed many additional responsibilities of both a banking and non-banking nature since the outbreak of war.

They cooperate in the sale of Victory Bonds, arrange bond deliveries and the deposit of bond interest to the owner's account. In the field of wartime rationing, they act as agents for the Wartime Prices and Trade Board in the conduct of "Ration Coupon Banking," assuming the tremendous task of handling, verifying and accounting for used coupons; and they also act as paying agents of the government organization handling subsidies to milk distributors. They cash hundreds of thousands of government payroll cheques. And they act as agents of the Foreign Exchange Control Board, handling the intricate technique of export and import transactions.

These extra duties and many others have placed a severe strain on bank staffs, in view of the enlistment of a large proportion of experienced personnel. Thousands of women have helped to meet the emergency and deserve the highest praise for the loyalty and skill they have shown in handling the record volume of work created by Canada's tremendous war program.

The banks' nation-wide facilities, manned by more than 30,000 trained workers, have been extensively used by the Government as a ready-made means of handling many special wartime tasks.

All That Glitters

By Frances Parkinson Keyes

Lifeboat drill took place immediately after luncheon on the first day out, and it was by no means perfunctory. The drill was hardly over when the San Pedro, which had not been going more than six or seven knots an hour at any time, groaned, creaked and came to a stop off Belle Isle. By dinner time it was apparent that it was going no farther that night. The barrage of questions began again.

"This is a ver' nice 'harbor," the captian said cheerfully, "ver' shallow. If there should be a submarine — you said you believed in submarines, non? — the San Pedro couldn't sink. She is right on the bottom anyway. You can all 'ave a nice long sleep."

There were rumors about a convoy, just as there had been rumors about many other things. This report, as it proved, had been made of more substantial stuff than most. When they unscrewed their porthole to let in the welcome morning air they could see, framed by its circle, another freighter bobbing up and down close behind them; when they got out on deck the sky and the ocean both seemed alive. Overhead two airplanes were swooping, and around a covey of cargoes two destroyers were frisking, lightly turning up foam as they wove their way in and out of the waves. Toward sunset, the orange and crimson sails of a dozen Breton fishing smacks came into view — brave little boats, venturing far out into the ocean. Both their color and heir courage seemed a fitting complement for the convoy.

But it was late that night when they saw the fairest picture of all. Cautiously switching out the last light, the captain opened the door leading from his quarters to the deck and motioned to them to step out there. The sea was as smooth as glass; and over it, all around them, the still dark shapes of ships were silently gliding forward. "You nevair saw anything like that before, Mesdames," the captain said at their shoulders. "Ah hope you nevair will again. Beautiful, is it not so, as you look at it this way? But that, Mesdames, is war."

The convoy stayed with the cargo three nights and two days, finally slipping away from it, as it had joined it, under cover of darkness. Presumably, it was out of the danger zone by this time. They settled down to a serene existence. Then suddenly both were dissipated, for beautiful, balmy weather announced the San Pedro's entrance into the Gulf Stream, though the captain still looked blank when anybody spoke to him about a route. Then came the unmistakable fog and wind of the Banks and a light which unofficially proclaimed Nantucket. The captain made a casual suggestion. "Maybe you like to send some little messages home? We are in territorial waters now."

"Some little messages home!" There was a sudden lump in Zoe's throat, a sudden mist before her eyes; looking at Helen with blurred vision, she saw that her sister-in-law was not even trying to hide her happy tears. They knew that by this time Bob and Guy and Senator and Mrs. Morton must be almost frantic with fear. They typed out their "little messages" with thankful hearts, and then they dressed for the captain's dinner in the best of spirits. And it was a very good dinner indeed. Everyone complimented the captain. He shrugged his shoulders.

"The San Pedro is the flagship now, we shall not call her a freight-air any more, we shall call her a luxury line-air. Has she not taken you on a splendid cruise, showing you all sorts of beautiful harbours? Now we must celebrate your health, Ladies, Gentlemen!" They drank their toasts standing, but it was to him, not to themselves.

Late that night, when Zoe and Helen were packing, Zoe emptied the contents of her brief case on her berth. She had kept this equipped for the emergency against which they had been told to provide, and into it every evening she had placed one copy of what she had written during the day, entrusting a carbon to Helen for similar safe-keeping. Several times in accepting these carbons, Helen had made a remark which had caused Zoe some secret amusement, though she had never given tongue to it.

"If — if anything should happen, Zoe, I'll be sure to give this to Bob. I'll tell him you went on working right up to the very end. It's been wonderful, the way you've worked. I don't see how you've done it. I believe these will be the very best articles you've ever written, too. And I'm sure Bob's going to feel the same way about them". There seemed to be no lurking fear in Helen's mind that if disaster did overtake them, it might strike at her and spare Zoe. Up to this moment, Zoe had forborne reminding her of this. But now that it was possible to jest again, she did so.

"I certainly appreciate your thoughtfulness in saying you'd see the stories got to Bob, whatever happened," she said whimsically. "But it's beginning to look as if I'd be able to hand them over to him myself. Would you like to get rid of those carbons. They must clutter up your dressing bag terribly. What else did you put in there, by the way?"

Helen opened her own bag and handed Zoe the carbons. It's contents, aside from these, were a carton of cigarettes and a pink satin nightgown, trimmed with ecru lace.

The San Pedro steamed into New York harbor at noon the next day. There were mists early in the morning but these gradually melted away. As they slipped slowly up the Hudson River, they saw all their surroundings gilded by the bright autumnal sun — the tall buildings, the fussy ferryboats, the endless docks, the multitudes that peopled them. Zoe was scanning the dock for Bob's face and finally she found it, upturned toward hers. Senator and Mrs. Morton were there too, and when Zoe saw them, only one thought flashed through her mind: "This time Bob and I won't have to think about what's going to happen to Helen. She could have had a man of her own here to meet her if she'd wanted him, but she didn't. She can go on to Washington with her father and mother. Bob and I can stay here by ourselves."

She knew that his thought had been the same as hers when he caught her in his arms and hugged her as if he would never let her go.
