Canada's New Payroll Deduction Tax

Is Seen as "Test Tube" for U.S. Law

Dominion Pays on 1942 Incomes, Giving "Preview" Of Congressional Measure, Which Operates in 1943

By JAMES MONTAGNES, NEA Service Correspondent

OTTAWA, Canada, - While Congress is debating income tax collection at the source and the advisability of forced savings, Canada's Parliament has announced that Canadians will start paying on their 1942 income from their pay envelopes on September 1, and will have to pay as part of their tax a portion which will be refundable after the war.

Canada has overhauled her income tax set-up for an all-out war effort, has set a pace for step income taxes and a new method of collecting them, just as she set the pace for price ceilings nearly six months ahead of the United States.

Canada is becoming the economic test tube for the North American continent.

Canada's new income taxes brought them much closer to those of Great Britain, have been much higher than those proposed by Congress. An American under the new income taxes now being collected in Washington would pay about $1,000, if he earns $5,000, is married and has two dependents.

Under the new Canadian tax plan, his Canadian counterpart starts paying in September a total of $1,062 on his 1942 income, will receive $600 of it back two years after the war ends with 2 per cent interest. Or, he saves that amount in life insurance, annuities, pension funds or principal on his home mortgage.

Last year that same Canadian paid $785 in 1941 but paid $1,118. His British brother pays practically the same amount, $1,855, part of which is refundable after the war.

Canadians staggered under the impact of the income taxes when they were announced at Ottawa on June 22 by Finance Minister J. L. Lasker. But they have evened out their standard of living. No sacrifice they felt was too great to beat the Axis. They were willing to cut their living expenditures. But in debate in Parliament following the announcement, Canadians asked that Ottawa also curb its normal expenditures, not
