A WALK REPEATED
Chapter 108

Paul came to her one morning—the morning of the day they were to leave.

"I don't know how you feel," he said, putting one arm affectionately around her as she stood near the window. "But after the mad whirl of this place, I long for the comparative quiet of the noiseless city in the world."

Patty leaned her head back against his shoulder, and turned a little so that Paul could kiss her cheek.

"Poor boy," she sympathized smilingly. "The worst of it is that it will be almost as bad when we get home, think of all the parties they gave us that we'll have to return."

"We'll take a week off and get out of some old clothes and we'll take a tramp somewhere into the country. I'll hunt up some sandwiches for lunch."

Patty ran off, delighted at the chance to get away alone with Paul for an hour or so. There was to be the biggest party of all that evening, to end at midnight when the late train stopped on the way east—the same train she had taken with her family when she went to New York before. Then she had a thought of seeing Paul—then she was happy at the idea of simply living in the same city that he lived in!

She reappeared in a wide gray skirt she used to play golf in—gains Paul was teaching her—and a short blue leather coat and hat that became the envy of seven pairs of eyes looking out from behind window curtains. And they set off.

"Thank you very much for walking when you drive the car just as well, I can't see," was Millie's parting remark.

As to the question of where to go—they both had but one answer. They followed the long central street, passed the club house and waved to a few friends busily decorating it for the dance that night. Cora's house, starting new and isolated, and stopped for a moment to look at the open busily laying the foundations for "Millie's Colonial" mansion—and out into the country.

The road went through the valley and up the timbered mountains. "Do you remember, when you were here and didn't know you very well?" Patty asked.

"Of course I remember. And it rained and we took shelter in a cleft under the rocks, hilly place for lunch. I'll build a fire there."

"We were almost romantic the other time," said Patty when they had achieved the cave and the sandwiches were spread before them and Paul was making the first Woman-like, she remembered sentimental part.

"Um-hum," Paul agreed, watching the sticks beginning to burn.

"Were you in love with me then?"

"Yes," Patty confessed boldly and laughed. "But not as much as now."

Paul abandoned his fire and came to the rock she sat upon.

"Sweetest," he called her. "I like you to say that. I was just on the edge of falling in love with you then. But it wouldn't have been a serious love. I had to see you at work, getting tired without complaining and being worried without losing your cheerfulness. I mean I had to see how fine you were, to appreciate you."

It was always a new idea—that he should appreciate her.

"You've made me over—in some ways," the man went on. "I thought all girls always had everything they wanted, spent all the money they could get on useless, pretty sort of things—I never thought much about the other girls, who worked for what they got, and what their families had too."

"Do you know what I want to do now—something my father used to talk about when I was a kid. But when I grew up, it seemed too hard to bother with and why should I when I always had money? But you've given me a serious purpose and an ambition."

"Poor boy," laughed Patty, her chin resting on his head, her eyes looking dreamily far out over the valley. "I think I loved you because you were always so spoiled and irresponsible."

"Do you think you'll love me less?"

"No," she said with conviction. "I don't think that anything would make much difference in our case. We have too much love to be harmed. Millie thought love ran out of

WOULD WALK THE FLOOR FOR HOURS AT NIGHT

TEN YEARS OF SUFFERING ENDED FOR SYDNEY WOMAN WHEN SHE GOT TANLAC. HER HEALTH IS PERFECT. "I feel like a different person."

Since taking Tanlac, it has given me new life and strength and I am enjoying better health than at any time during the past ten years, said Mrs. Joan Melsaac, 32 Charlotte St., Sydney, N. S.

"Nobody knows how I suffered during the past ten years and how I longed for something to give me relief. My appetite was so poor, I ate very little of anything, and some mornings a glass of water was all I would take for breakfast. Whenever I did eat anything I would suffer the greatest distress afterwards and finally my nerves gave away and I got little rest either day or night. It was quite usual for me to get up out of bed and walk the floor for hours and in the morning I would feel weak and miserable."

"I can say for Tanlac it has brought me health and happiness and my gratitude to this wonderful medicine is beyond the power of words to express. I am perfectly well and strong now and enjoying life as I haven't been able to do for many years."

Ten years of married life, but Millie was wrong. She never was enough in love with Humphrey, she let herself grow careless, about her life was disillusioned about her. "I'll know better than that."

She traced the parting of his hair lightly with her finger, and kissed his head. "We'll always be perfectly happy, as far as we ourselves are concerned," she protested off expecting an eternal Utopia. "We'll have trouble enough—my mother is breaking, I can't tell it by her curious indifference to things. And Mrs. Munn wants to live with us, and we must let her because she needs us so much. But, even though we love her, I don't like her—well, being just to ourselves. We're bound to have differences as we grow older and develop."

"Do you mind all that?" asked Paul.

"Not as long as I'm with you most of the time, not as long as I know always that you love me," she answered serenely.
