

Baby's First Three Months Were Misery. Cuticura Healed.

"My baby's first three months were misery. He had a rash like prickly heat on the side of his limbs from his knees up. These turned to large water blisters, then inflamed spots, after which scales formed. Anyone would believe he was marked for life. I tried several kinds of ointments, but they had no effect. Then a doctor advised Cuticura Soap and Ointment and he was perfectly healed in two weeks." (Signed) Mrs. Crawford, R. R. 1, Trenton, Ont., Dec. 22, 1932.

HEARTS AFIRE

By MARY CHRISTIE

CHAPTER VIII

An Awkward Situation

"If I come down to Pear-Tree Cottage to-morrow afternoon, will you give me a cup of tea, Peter?" begged Miss Virginia Dale in her most fascinating voice. She stood there on the pool's edge, gazing up at Prudence's "tramp" as though he were the only creature on the earth. As for Prudence herself, she might be a mere pebble on the bank, for all the notice that the other girl took of her.

Prudence was acutely conscious of the very awkward situation. Her own escort ignominiously fled . . . her crude error as to the social status of this man . . . and now to be the unwilling gooseberry in a love-scene!

But it was in no lover's tones that the shabby fisherman replied, unhesitatingly: "I'm no great hand at making tea, Miss Dale. Indeed—turning with a twinkle towards Prudence—"this young lady here will bear me out when I tell you I've no social graces of any sort!"

Virginia crinkled her pert nose in disdain. She didn't even glance at the flushed cheeks of the other maiden.

"Some people have no common sense," she critically observed. "But as for social graces, I like you better without 'em, Peter. You couldn't be a lounge lizard if you tried."

"Heaven forbid!" The grey eyes crinkled into the most delightful little furrows at the corners.

"But just the same, I'm coming down to tea to-morrow," said the young beauty in the ravishing gown, with a determined air. "I shan't permit you to be such a hermit, Peter. It's bad for you never to have a woman around the place."

He grinned again. Against her own judgment, Prudence had to admit there was something really charming in that smile of his.

"How about old Nannie for a sweet feminine influence? She's as deaf as a door-post, as silent as the grave, and never interferes with me. My ideal woman, in fact." He turned to Prudence, laughing. "Old Nannie cooks and cleans for me," he said, explanatory-wise.

Virginia tittered angrily. He went on: "I'm spending the whole of to-morrow in my laboratory at that new experiment I'm working on—as a penance for playing truant to-day."

Virginia flung a sharp look at the "difficult" young man, and then at Prudence. Had the two had a rendezvous here by the stream? And was there anything between the pair of them? It was bad enough to have this simple country maid walk off with Bertram Traymore—her especial property—but it was maddening to think that she was chasing Peter—oddly attractive, oddly elusive Peter, who was so different from the others!

Peter was looking quizzically at her, as though he read her thoughts. Sometimes she had the uncanny feeling that he possessed a sixth sense, and did know what was passing in her mind! He said now, chaffingly: "I didn't come here expecting to meet a lovely lady . . . no, no, not two lovely ladies . . ." he corrected himself. "Nor was I like Narcissus, gazing into the pool at the reflection on my own beauty—being an ugly chap and well aware of the fact. The right to fish in this pool and down stream is included in the rent of Pear-Tree Cottage, Mrs. Vanstare being my landlord—so I came here to woo the elusive trout."

So he had the right to fish these waters, after all! thought Prudence, harking back to Traymore's officious conduct, and its summary rebuke. This Peter man had behaved abominably, but of course there had been provocation . . .

"If you won't give me tea to-morrow, I shall put on overalls and come right into the lab, and help you with your work," announced Virginia Dale.

"Too dangerous!"

"Too dangerous?" she cooed at him. "Don't you know a woman loves to play with fire?" (How bold she is!) thought Prudence, her own cheeks a-flame. If only she could slip away unnoticed . . .

"I was speaking of my experiment, not of myself. Did the man's lip curl a little? I assure you I'm distressingly safe. Quite un-Don-Juan-ish. Almost a back number."

Not for Virginia's sake, but on behalf of her whole sex, did Prudence hate him at that moment, with his self-sufficient air.

"If you'll excuse me, I will go. No, don't come too." She moved as though to turn away.

He made bad worse by saying, with a twinkle:—"I promised your friend to see you safely to the Towers"—and fell into step beside her, Virginia on the other side.

"I don't need an escort, thank you." (She would show him!) "Oh yes, you do. An escort—and a chaperon. Were filling the bill, aren't you, Miss Dale?" He glanced quizzically at Virginia, who tossed her head in real annoyance. Did the man really think she was much older than this chit? A chaperon, indeed? How dare he? But of course he was just teasing!—lantalizing creature that he was!

"Call yourself a back number, but don't include me in it!" she flung back with assured archness. "Miss Page and I are very much of an age, as a matter of fact."

"I am nineteen," said Prudence in prosaic tone. "And never been kissed, I'll wager," tittered the other girl, annoyed at the naive announcement. She herself would never see twenty-five again.

Prudence flushed up, and was silent. The recollection of Traymore's stolen kiss sent a little tremor through her, thrilling as it had been. Would he hate her now? She wondered. He had been too hasty with this Peter man, and had come off worst in the encounter. She had been an unhappy witness of the scene.

But—yes—she cared for him. No use denying it. "I won't come any further. I'm too disreputable," said Peter Armstrong, as they neared the house. Prudence walked on, leaving the other girl to bid adieu to him. Hateful man!

A turn in the path revealed the garden-party in full force. And—yes, it was he—in an immaculate, dry suit and looking very handsome—Bertram Traymore, strolling directly towards her, with a smile upon his face!

Steel Industry

Sends Sharp Note To Washington

NEW YORK, Aug. 4.—(A.P.)—The steel industry today informed the National Recovery Administration that it had "gone the limit" in the matter of its code and could go no further.

Robert P. Lamont, President of the American Iron & Steel Institute, in a communication addressed to the Washington authorities, stated: "We call attention to the fact that, in accomplishing the great purpose of the National Recovery Act, the members of the code have already gone beyond anything that can be justified by present conditions. They can justify themselves to their stock-holders only by the realization of the hopes aroused by the efforts of the national administration. They cannot go further."

Concerning the maximum hours of labor and minimum rates of pay, Mr. Lamont said it was not deemed necessary to restate the industry's position nor to add to the facts stated and the statistical data presented at the previous hearing.

"We desire again," he declared, "to emphasize that practical, not theoretical, questions are involved and that they cannot be solved merely by mathematical computation, since there is probably no industry in the country involving so many variable factors as the steel industry."

"Glamor, grace IN WINTER MODE PARIS, August 7.—Renaissance of elegance in furs, feathers and luxurious fabrics will mark the new Winter mode now taking shape in dressmakers' salons.

A long slinky silhouette revealing the curves of feminine figures will form the profile on which it is built, declares one of the leading designers.

"Glamor, grace and femininity will distinguish the new Winter mode," says Captain Edward Moynoux, whose house dresses some of the most fashionable Parisians. "Women are ready to be creatures of elegance again and Winter fashions will give them a chance. Once more they may sweep into ball-rooms."

"The new evening silhouette will be long and slinky, gently revealing feminine curves, although overtight lines will not appear. Day skirts, however, will be very little longer, for the demands of the modern woman must be considered.

"Feathers will adorn the new Winter hats and luxurious furs will trim many costumes. This will mean greater expense in some clothes, but I believe economic conditions warrant it."
