THE THEATRES

After the serious films shown at the Prince Edward Theatre on Wednesday, the well chosen programme of photo-plays put on last night came as a pleasing change.

There was a particularly interesting programme at the People's Theatre, the last of the "Exploits of Elaine" series being the outstanding feature.

It was an Englishman, although an Americanized Englishman, who invented the motion picture. His name was Edward Murybridge, a native of Kingston-on-Thames, according to "The Cinematograph Book."

He arranged twenty-four cameras in a row opposite a white screen. From the screen to each shutter of the camera was a thread. Then a horse was trotted before the screen, and as it passed it broke each thread in turn and thus photographed itself twenty-four times.

another Englishman who conceived the idea of throwing moving photographs on a screen. This Englishman was Mr. R. W. Paul, a scientific instrument maker, and his first attempt was witnessed by a few London policemen. One night, in 1895, the police heard strange noises in a certain building in Hatton Garden, and on entering, found, not a grim tragedy, but an enthusiastic inventor who had succeeded in showing moving pictures on a screen. The show was repeated for their benefit, and they were the first persons, other than Mr. Paul and his assistant, to know of this new discovery.
